A multiple technique approach is used to study YBa2Cu3O7 grown on SrTiO3 as a function of post-deposition annealing temperature. X-ray diffraction data are used to determine the relative amounts of a-axis and c-axis oriented growth. These results are compared to the surface morphology of the films observed by SEM. Secondary ion mass spectrometry (SIMS) is used to study the diffusion of substrate elements into the YBCO films as a function of post-deposition annealing temperature. The data obtained from all these techniques are correlated to determine an optimized temperature for post-deposition annealing. The results of the study show that the desired c-axis oriented growth can be obtained with minimal diffusion of substrate elements into the film at annealing temperatures of 750 C.

A series of important papers by David Turnbull and his collaborators in the late 1940's and early 1950's laid the experimental and theoretical foundation of modern nucleation theory. The elegance, versatility, and generality of the phenomenological approach, coupled with brilliant and insightful experimental confirmation, sparked widespread application which continues today. Much of David Turnbull's subsequent work in other subjects grew directly or indirectly from that work.

The authors report the observation, by transmission electron microscopy, that single crystal silicon and germanium is converted to an amorphous state at room temperature directly under both Vickers and Knoop indentations. The effect is seen for crystal orientations of (brackets: 001), (brackets: 011) and (brackets: 111), and with applied loads between 0.1 N and 0.5 N. They also observe that the materials become electrically conducting under load and that the process is reversible on subsequent unloading and reloading. Furthermore, the transformed phase is found to make ohmic contact to the surrounding, untransformed, semiconductor.

The authors compare measurements of magnetization profiles across 180 deg surface domain walls in a permalloy ferromagnet with calculations from micromagnetic models. The models were solved both by relaxation and by a time-evolution calculation. The measurements were made using scanning electron microscopy with polarization analysis. The authors obtain good agreement without postulating any surface anisotropy effect. This is the first successful comparison between experiment and a time-evolution calculation of domain walls.

A quantitative description of electron beam - specimen interactions with solids forms the basis for developing models by which scanning electron microscope images of semiconductor materials and devices can be calculated. Elastic and inelastic scattering processes are considered, including both discrete and continuous energy loss descriptions. These processes can be described by analytic functions, and by considering both elastic and inelastic scattering, simulation of individual electron trajectories by Monte Carlo calculations is possible. Applications to specific problems of interest to semiconductor science and technology are described, including spatial resolution at interfaces, details of contrast in charge collection microscopy (electron beam induced conductivity), and energy deposition in solids.

Crystalline erbium thin films and Er/Y superlattices with varying Er-layer thicknesses have been grown by molecular-beam epitaxy. The magnetic and structural properties of these samples have been analyzed by x-ray-scattering, bulk magnetization, and neutron-diffraction techniques. From a comparison of the data for the two systems, the importance of interfacial strain relative to artificial modulation in shaping the magnetic behavior has been determined. Though the basic nature of the erbium magnetic order is not qualitatively altered in either the thin films or superlattices, the conical ferromagnetic phase is suppressed in all of the samples considered. The enhanced critical fields exhibit a systematic dependence on Er-layer thickness. These effects appear to follow directly from the epitaxial basal-plane strain which is measurable in films over 14,000 A thick. The strain, along with a 'clamping' of the Er thermal expansion to the Y lattice, leads to a reduction of the magnitude of the magnetoelastic energy that drives the ferromagnetic transition. The dependence of the magnetoelastic energy on the epitaxial strain is described by a model which accounts for the elastic coupling of the erbium lattice to the yttrium.

Keywords: *Electron-atom collisions, Electron scattering, Ferromagnetic materials, Magnetic storage, Microstructure, Reprints, *Electron spin polarization, Secondary electrons, Sodium atoms.

Two experimental programs are discussed which exploit the use of polarized electrons for studies of fundamental processes and physical properties. In one program, collisions between spin-polarized electrons and optically pumped sodium atoms provide a very detailed characterization of the spin-dependent interactions important in low-energy electron-atom collisions. The results of these measurements provide a critical test for the reliability of state-of-the-art electron scattering calculations. In the second program, the spin polarization of secondary electrons ejected by high-energy electron impact is used to determine the magnetic structure of ferromagnetic materials with very high spatial resolution (about 60 nm). The ability to perform such studies with high resolution has been exploited both in studies of the basic magnetic properties of ferromagnetic materials and in studies of how these basic properties affect the magnetic structure and performance of devices used for magnetic information storage.

High-spatial-resolution magnetization maps of ferromagnetic surfaces are generated with use of scanning electron microscopy with polarization analysis (SEMPA). The structure of surface Neel walls is measured by SEMPA and compared directly to the results of micromagnetics simulations. The authors find that the surface magnetic properties observed with SEMPA can be modeled using standard micromagnetic theory using only bulk parameters. Surface-domain-wall magnetization profiles were measured, using two different probe diameters in each case, for an Fe(100) single crystal and for Permalloy films with thicknesses of 0.12, 0.16, 0.20, and 0.24 micrometer. The micromagnetic simulations show the 180 deg wall of the bulk turning over into a Neel wall at the surface with the magnetization in the plane of the surface. The Neel wall extends from the surface into the bulk over a depth approximately equal to a Bloch-wall width.

In recent years the progress in computational mechanics has made it possible to adopt more sophisticated constitutive models for solving complicated plasticity problems. For the formulation of elastic-plastic theory at finite strain, E. H. Lee decomposed the deformation gradient into a product of the elastic and plastic parts instead of assuming that the strain rate is the combination of the elastic and plastic strain rates. A finite element model has been formulated based on E. H. Lee's theory. Accordingly, a three-dimensional general purpose finite element software package has been developed. The simple tension problem and the simple shear problem are solved as examples so that the numerical solutions and the exact analytical solutions can be compared. Finally, a tensile test of a thin-walled aluminum alloy tube is solved and compared with the experimental data. The good agreement between the finite element solution and the experimental data demonstrates the validity and applicability of the proposed numerical model.

Very recently, a phenomenon long known in angle-resolved x-ray photoelectron spectroscopy (XPS) has been reinterpreted. The new interpretation is that XPS peak intensities are enhanced at angles corresponding to axes connecting the photoemitting atom to its immediate neighboring atoms. These enhanced intensities thus identify the bond axes present near the surface. In the paper, examples are presented of the great power of the 'XPS searchlight' effect as a new tool for studying epitaxy and interfaces.

One of the most important aspects of the structure of Ba2YCu3O(x) is the local arrangement of the oxygen atoms on the basal plane of the unit cell for compositions comprised between x = 6.0 and x = 7.0 (the 'basal plane' is defined by the copper atoms forming the Cu-O2 chains). The paper discusses, from a geometric point of view, models of vacancy formation and ordering in the pure compound, and possible configurations of the oxygen atoms in metal doped materials. These models take into account the existence of twinning in samples of composition 6.5 < or = x < or = 7.0, are consistent with the observed movement of the twin walls occurring when the oxygen stoichiometry is varied and explain the symmetry and the composition of the metal doped compounds. As the oxygen atoms relevant in the study are those located on the basal plane of the structure, in what follows one needs to consider only the atomic configuration on the plane and one may ignore all the other atoms in the unit cell.

Radiation-enhanced diffusion (RED) was observed during the Auger electron spectroscopy sputter depth profiling of multilayered Ag/Ni thin films. Broadening of the thin (4 nm) silver layers occurred during sputter profiling and resulted in silver Auger intensity profiles for each of these five layers which were asymmetric, exhibiting a steep leading edge followed by a more slowly decreasing tail. These findings can be interpreted in terms of interface broadening due to two main factors: (1) surface roughening--symmetric broadening; (2) RED of silver--asymmetric broadening. With the model, it has been possible to separate these factors and to determine the rate of RED.

The attenuation length, lambda, was measured as a function of kinetic energy for low energy electrons (8-70 eV) traveling through SiO2 with the use of core-level soft x-ray photoemission. Two oxides of different thickness were compared, and the extra attenuation resulting from the additional oxide on the thicker sample was used to determine the attenuation length. The curve resulting from an analysis which employs an exponential attenuation model displays a minima at an electron kinetic energy of about 35 eV, which is a result of scattering from the bulk plasmon. Below 35 eV, lambda increases and reaches a local maxima at about 20 eV, at which point lambda begins to decrease again. The decrease in lambda at low electron energies arises in part from electron-phonon scattering. This is confirmed by the shape of the bulk Si 2p photoemission peak observed on the thicker oxide sample, which is distorted by the phonon-induced loss processes.

The bismuth-based high-T(c) superconductors can be processed via an amorphous Bi-Pb-Sr-Ca-Cu oxide. The amorphous oxides were prepared by melting the constituent powders in an alumina crucible at 1200 C in air, followed by pouring the liquid onto an aluminum plate, and rapidly pressing with a second plate. In the amorphous state, no crystalline phase was identified in the powder X-ray diffraction pattern of the quenched materials. After heat treatment at high temperature, the amorphous materials crystallized into a glass-ceramic containing a large fraction of the Bi2Sr2Ca2Cu3O(x) phase (T(C)=110K). A comment is made on the article '2D and 3D Magnetic Ordering of Er in ErBa2Cu3O(x) (6 = or < x = or < 7)', by Maletta, et al. We point out that our originally published Meissner Effect data conclusively shows that our sample is fully superconducting, contrary to their assertion. Secondly, we note that our temperature measurements are done via a standard four-probe resistance measurement, which gives a correct value for the resistance of the calibrated thermometer, while their resistance measurements yield values which are systematically high, thus providing an incorrect temperature scale. Hence their own thermometry is in error rather than ours, contrary to their assertion.

The forward scattering of the Cu 2p(3/2) core level photoelectrons by overlying Ni lattice atoms which occurs in the photoemission process has been used to follow the segregation of Cu to the surface in epitaxial Ni-Cu-Ni(100) sandwich structures. When 1-monolayer of Cu is covered by 1-2 monolayers (ML) of Ni, surface diffusion processes constitute the mechanism by which the segregation occurs, whereas if 1 ML Cu is covered by 10 ML Ni or more, the segregation involves the usual bulk (vacancy) diffusion mechanism.

The authors have measured the magnetization M of superconducting YBa2Cu3O(x)-AgO composites with T(c) approximately equal to 92 K as a function of an applied magnetic field H at 77 and 87 K. A very pronounced M-H hysteresis loop occurs even at 87 K, indicating the presence of extremely strong pinning centers. The results of these measurements, together with a simple model, explain quantitatively why these superconductors could be suspended below a magnet.

Thin films of Bi-Sr-Ca-Cu-O, deposited on (100) cubic zirconia by laser ablation from a bulk superconducting target of nominal composition BiSrCaCu2O(x), have been investigated by dc resistance and magnetically modulated microwave absorption measurements. The latter technique reveals important features regarding the phase purity of superconducting samples that are masked in the dc resistance measurements. The superconducting behavior of the films, as a function of the substrate temperature during deposition and the post-deposition annealing conditions, is discussed.

The study was carried out to determine the effect substrate temperature, target to substrate angle, and the partial pressure of oxygen in the sputtering atmosphere on the stoichiometry. Films were deposited by planar magnetic sputtering of stoichiometric 1:2:3 pressed and sintered targets on MgO, ZrO2(Y) and ZrO2 coated Al2O3 substrates. DEX and WDS were used to determine the chemical composition of the thin films. X-ray diffraction was used to identify the structure after film crystallization at 1175K and oxidation at 800K. The partial pressure of oxygen appears to have the most profound effect on the stoichiometry by lowering the barium content. Negative ion resputtering of the growing film apparently also slows film growth rate. Films deposited on alumina circuitboard with a ZrO2 barrier layer have demonstrated transitions to superconducting behavior at 95K when the stoichiometric ratio is preserved.

New materials with enormous practical interest are now being produced in industry by far more sophisticated processing methods than those used a decade ago. The structure of these advanced materials is not in a 'stable' state normally found in nature. Even traditional structural materials used for familiar industrial components are virtually all frozen configurationally from states that are metastable or unstable before freezing. Moreover, some materials contain non-equilibrium atomic level dispersions of impurities and topologically metastable structures. In the areas of electronics and electrooptics, materials have already been made with structural control at the atomic level. The wide use of single crystals and single crystal layers as industrial materials requires precise information on atomic behavior during modern processing, such as Czochralski growth and chemical vapor deposition. Success with such 'high-tech' materials requires the knowledge of new ways to arrange atoms in order to achieve the desired properties.

Streaking images restricted to the direction of the diffraction (scattering) vector have been observed on transmission through undoped GaAs. These disruption images (caused by the reduction of diffraction in the direction of observation) appear both in the forward and in Bragg diffracted directions in monochromatic synchrotron radiation diffraction imaging. This previously unobserved phenomenon can be explained in terms of the effective volume of planar defects or platelets which affects the absorption coefficient in anomalous transmission. Such regions of the crystal look perfect despite the presence of imperfections when the scattering vector is not perpendicular to the normal of the platelets.

The initial stages of degradation of high-T(c) superconductor surfaces by interaction with atmospheric gases have been studied using ultraviolet photoelectron spectroscopy. O2 has little effect, while H2O adsorbs dissociatively with an initial sticking coefficient S(o) 1, and forms a surface hydroxide. CO2 adsorbs forming a carbonate-like surface species with an initial sticking coefficient of 0.3. CO is observed to result in similar adsorbed surface species with a much lower sticking coefficient of 0.0003.

Fundamental information about the structure of the valence band and the chemical valence states of the various constituents of the La-Sr-Cu, Y-Ba-Cu, Bi-Sr-Ca-Cu and Tl-Ca-Ba-Cu oxides have been obtained using photoelectron spectroscopy. These results show that the one-electron theories do not adequately describe the electronic structure of these superconductors. The atomic origins of the features observed in the valence bands have been investigated by studying photoemission resonances and changes in excitation cross-sections with photon energy. Results to date suggest that these materials have varying densities of states at the Fermi level, valence bands composed of O 2p and Cu 3d states, and display no significant changes in the band structure associated with the superconducting behavior when the temperature is lowered below T(c). In addition, the complex surface chemistry of these oxides make it essential to study the surface stoichiometry and the interaction of simple molecules. O2 and CO are found to interact only weakly with the surfaces of the materials studied to date, while H2O and CO2 react strongly, forming hydroxides and carbonates.

Inelastic-neutron-scattering techniques have been used to measure the generalized phonon density of states in superconducting Nd(1.85)Ce(0.15)CuO4. There is reasonable agreement at low energies between the authors' measurements and recent point-contact-tunneling density-of-states measurements reported by Huang et al., which suggests that phonons play a major role in pairing in the electron-superconductor systems. The correspondence at higher energies, however, is not particularly good, but probably reflects the difficulty in obtaining quantitative tunneling data.

The authors report the structural and electronic properties of Cs adsorbed on room-temperature GaAs and InSb (110) surfaces as observed with scanning t unneling microscopy. Cs initially forms long one-dimensional (1D) zigzag chains on both surfaces. Additional Cs adsorption on GaAs(110) results in the formation of a 2D overlayer consisting of five-atom Cs polygons arranged in a c(4x4) superlattice. The tunneling gap measured over these insulating structures narrows with the transition from 1D to 2D, with metallic characteristics observed following saturation with a second Cs overlayer.

The development of thin-film dielectrics compatible with the epitaxial growth of YBa2Cu3O(7-delta)(YBCO) is crucial to the fabrication of multi-layer device and circuit structures. The authors have investigated the YBCO/SrTiO3(STO) system by fabricating YBCO/STO bilayers and simple YBCO/STO/YBCO crossover structures. The thin films were deposited in situ by pulsed laser deposition and analyzed using x-ray diffraction and scanning electron microscopy. The film interfaces were characterized by secondary ion mass spectrometry (SIMS) depth profiling. They have developed photolithographic and wet-etching processes for patterning the crossovers whidh are compatible with these materials. The crossover structures were characterized by resistance and insulator pinhole density as well as the superconducting properties of the patterned top and bottom YBCO electrodes (critical temperature, T(c) and critical current density, J(c)). Using SrTiO3 as the insulating layer,they have made crossovers with good isolation between layers (>100 Megohm) and high J(c) even in the top electrode (J(c)(76 K) > 100,000 A/cm squared.

Subsidiary absorption butterfly curves of spin-wave instability threshold versus static in-plane field have been obtained for yttrium iron garnet (YIG) thin films at 3 GHz. The butterfly curves have been found to be rather anomalous, typically displaying a pronounced dip and a very low minimum threshold. These anomalous features are attributed to the overlap of the subsidiary absorption field region with ferromagnetic resonance (FMR). First-order instability theory was extended to include the uniform mode response near FMR. The extended theory yields good fits to the data for reasonable values of the YIG FMR linewidths. The theoretical analysis also shows a predicted flip in the azimuthal propagation angle phi(sub k) for the unstable spin waves in the region of FMR overlap. With increasing field, there are predicted discontinuous changes in phi(sub k) from 90 deg. to 0 deg. and back to 90 deg. in the region of FMR.

The technique of soft x-ray fluorescence spectroscopy (SXE) is complimentary to that of photoemission spectroscopy (PES). SXE probes the local partial density of states (PDOS), selects dipole allowed symmetries, and is not necessarily surface sensitive. PES on the other hand, averages over tHe DOS and can be used to measure the dispersion of the energy bands. PES is also very surface sensitive. The authors present measurements on the high T(c) superconductors, the quasicrystalline phase of AlMn, and the LiAl intermetallic alloy. These measurements provide insight for theoretical modeling. In the case of the high T(c) compound and the intermetallic compound, the measurements are in good agreement with the theory. However, for the quasicrystals, the measurements provide new insights to challenge theory.

A report of work in progress to determine the feasibility of imaging the magnetization of ferromagnetic samples with the scanning tunneling microscope (STM) is presented. A vacuum system was designed to test several different proposals as well as to prepare and characterize thin films of magnetic materials by conventional means, including STM. This was begun with an attempt to detect spatially resolved spin-polarization of secondary electrons emitted from the sample when operating the STM in the scanning field emission mode. Results are currently inconclusive, but encouraging. A weak spin-polarization signal has been observed corresponding to one of the in-plane components of magnetization. However, topographic feedthrough has not been fully eliminated as a possible spurious source of contrast.

A material's longitudinal sound-wave velocity relates strongly to the electron-lattice interaction, which affects both conductivity and superconductivity. Measuring phase velocity versus frequency, v(omega), reveals dispersion, which may arise from various sources. To measure v(omega) accurately over a large frequency range, the authors used a modified amplitude-spectrum, pulse-echo method. Specifically, they used a buffer rod whose elastic impedance differed substantially from that of the specimen. Also, they used very broadband ultrasonic transducers and a broadband receiver with large dynamic range. They established the validity of their measurement method by measuring BaTiO3 and SrTiO3 polycrystals. They then used the method to measure the longitudinal-wave velocities in an Eu1Ba2Cu3O7 superconductor, both at 295 and 76 K. Against expectation, they found no remarkable dispersion.

The Neel temperature is very sensitive to the oxygen content, with T(N)(X approx =0) approx = 500 K, while the spin configuration is independent of x.

Neutron inelastic scattering measurements have been taken with triple-axis and time-of-flight techniques to determine the crystal field levels of the rare-earth ions in the cubic Heusler alloys HoPd2Sn and ErPd2Sn. The observed excitations have been identified as crystal field in origin by their dispersionless character as well as by the temperature and wave-vector dependence of the intensities. Analysis of the data shows that the energies and intensities can be understood on the basis of a crystalline electric field with cubic point symmetry, with Lea, Leask, and Wolf parameters of W = 0.0287(4) meV, x = 0.3248(8) for HoPd2Sn, and W = -0.0450(4) meV, x = 0.3022(6) for ErPd2Sn. The crystal field parameters for the other rare-earth elements have also been calculated by scaling to the values determined for HoPd2Sn.

An approach to measure semiconductor structures for nondestructive submicrometer metrology in the scanninng electron microscope (SEM) at low accelerating voltage is described, using the collection and measurement of only the backscattered electron signal rather than the more commonly used secondary electron signal. In the technique, the backscattered electron signal is collected using a high-efficiency microchannel-plate electron detector system with the front face of the detector biased negatively to reject the low-energy secondary electrons thus collecting only the backscattered electrons. The advantage of using the backscattered electron signal is discussed, as well as a comparison to measurements using the secondary electron signal. The potential of the technique for application to accurate SEM metrology and standards development is also discussed.

X-ray data were collected on films of Al(0.72)Mn(0.22)Si(0.06) sputtered on NaCl at 45. Films showed a typical metallic glass structure fa ctor, S(Q), while at 230 C the structure was quasicrystalline plus Al. A combined broadening function was applied to the normalized and reduced S(Q) for the 230 C film to bring it essentially into coincidence with the amorphous (45 C) S(Q). This involved both a Lorentzian broadening for particle size and a broadening proportional to Q squared associated with phason strain, and leads the authors to conclude that the glass, or amorphous, phase is a defect limit of the quasicrystal.

Diamond films grown by filament-assisted or microwave-plasma-assisted chemical-vapor deposition (CVD) were characterized by photoluminescence (PL), cathodoluminescence (CL), and Raman spectroscopies. The laser-excited PL spectra of these films in and near the carbon Raman region (1100-1800/cm from the 514.5-nm laser line, or 2.18-2.28 eV) are broad and featureless; CL spectra measured within a wider spectral range (1.5-3.5 eV) shows several distinct components. Because of its correlation with the Raman band of sp2-bonded carbon, the visible-laser-excited PL in the carbon Raman region is attributed to sp2-bonded carbon clusters. The spectrally integrated CL intensity is found to vary from specimen to specimen approximately inversely with the intensity of the laser-excited PL. The inverse correlation is especially strong for one component of the CL, a broad band at 2.85 eV. To explain these results, it is proposed that the luminescence centers in these CVD diamond films can be classified into two types with differing excitation and recombination properties. Rate equations are derived for the luminescence kinetics of such a system of two types of recombination centers.

The paramagnetic state of the phosphorus-on-indium antisite has been observed by optically detected magnetic resonance (ODMR) in as-grown zinc-doped indium phosphide. The antisite resonance is seen both as an enhancing ODMR signal on the antisite-acceptor photoluminescence (PL) at 0.8 eV and as a quenching ODMR signal on the shallow-donor-acceptor PL at 1.37 eV. The dependence of the ODMR on microwave power, microwave modulation frequency, and photoexcitation intensity is examined, and a rate equation model is developed for the important recombination processes. The experimental results suggest that the antisite-acceptor recombination rate is approximately 40,000/s; the antisite electron spins are unthermalized, but recombine with spin-thermalized holes; and the antisite concentration may be greater than 2 x 10 to the 15th power/cc. Two other resonances are also observed, the shallow donor resonance at g=1.217 and an unidentified broad resonance at g=2.0.

Photoluminescence excitation (PLE) spectra at photon energies near the indirect band gap of diamond have been obtained for diamond films grown by the filament-assisted chemical vapor deposition (CVD) method. The PLE intensity was observed to increase abruptly with photon energy above 5.5 eV. This increase coincides with the onset of phonon-emission-assisted interband absorption, which was observed independently by diffuse transmittance measurements. A lower-energy PLE threshold at about 5.25 eV, which coincides approximately with the onset of phonon-absorption-assisted interband absorption, was observed in the spectrum of a gem-quality natural diamond, but not in the spectra of the CVD-grown films. Emission spectra of the luminescence excited by above-band-gap photons have features similar to luminescence spectra of the same specimens excited by 20-keV electrons. The spectrally integrated intensities of the luminescence excited by above-band-gap photons and by electrons were found to vary from specimen to specimen in a linearly related manner, suggesting that similar recombination processes occur in both cases.

The morphology of silver layers deposited and annealed on laser ablated YBa2Cu3O(7-delta) films has been examined. Silver was found to dewet the YBa2Cu3O(7-delta) (001) surface on annealing in oxygen and nitrogen. This dewetting behavior may be kineticly inhibited by using either thick silver layers or short anneals and low temperatures. Silver layers 70 nm to 2.5 micrometers thick were studied on films deposited on SrTiO3, LaAlO3 and MgO substrates. Anneal times were varied from 6.5 min to 15 hrs at temperatures from 200 to 700 C.

The effect of a constant electric current on the crystal-melt interface morphology during directional solidification at constant velocity of a binary alloy is considered. A linear temperature field is assumed, and thermoelectric effects and Joule heating are neglected; electromigration and differing electrical conductivities of crystal and melt are taken into account. A two-dimensional weakly nonlinear analysis is carried out to third order in the interface amplitude, resulting in a cubic amplitude equation that describes whether the bifurcation from the planar state is supercritical or subcritical. For wavelengths corresponding to the most dangerous mode of linear theory, the authors calculate the demarcation between supercritical behavior as a function of processing conditions and material parameters. The bifurcation behavior is a sensitive function of the magnitude and direction of the electric current and of the electrical conductivity ratio.

Scanning tunneling microscopy has been employed to study clean and Cs-covered InSb(110) surfaces. Atomic-resolution images of both the filled and empty electronic state densities have been obtained. The surface relaxation determined from these images is in good agreement with that predicted by structure calculations. A variety of surface defects have been observed, with the most common appearing to be simple Sb vacancies. Adjacent In and Sb vacancies (Schottky defects) have also been observed. The perturbation of the surface surrounding these defects is asymmetrical along (in brackets: 001), as might be expected due to the asymmetry in the surface. Surprisingly, the perturbation is also asymmetrical along (in brackets: 1,-1,0), where symmetry is expected. Cs adsorbed on room-temperature InSb(110) forms one-dimensional zig-zag chains along (in brackets: 1,-1,0), similar to those previously observed on GaAs(110).

A model of the free growth of a two-dimensional single crystal of pure material from an undercooled melt is presented. Quasi-steady-state heat flow and anisotropic interfacial properties couple in the model, governing the morphology of the evolving crystal-melt interface. The evolution of an initially slightly perturbed circular crystal as it grows from the linear into the nonlinear regime both in the absence and in the presence of anisotropic interfacial growth kinetics is studied. The calculations show that in the absence of kinetic anisotropy, splitting of the tip of an initial perturbation occurs. For an initial shape consisting of two Fourier components, a resonant growth effect of the high frequency Fourier component occurs for special initial configurations. Furthermore, the overall rate of crystal growth is shown to be only of the heat extracted from the system and is virtually independent of the interface shape; this is a consequence of the quasi-steady state approximation to heat flow. In the presence of anisotropic growth kinetics, tip stabilization may be observed for certain initial conditions. However, a resonant growth effect can still act to destabilize the tip even in the presence of anisotropic interfacial growth kinetics.

Switching voltages can occur in four-wire current transport measurements of sintered high-T(c) superconductors. These switching voltages are irreversible shifts in the voltage-current characteristic of the superconductor that result in multiple branches. The voltage along these branches can be very nonlinear as a function of current and can be positive or negative in polarity relative to the current direction. These voltages can interface with the correct determination of resistivity and critical current density. Experimental data on unaligned sintered Y1Ba2Cu3O(7-delta) which illustrate the complex nature of the voltages and the confusion they can create are presented. Models based on weak links and H(c1) and on other effects, are discussed as are observations on NbTi and Nb3Sn based superconductors.

A hierarchy of dielectric sphere models is presented to account for the shift in binding energy with particle size for a core hole at the center of a jellium sphere of radius R. It is shown that the classical final state interaction between the screening charge deficit at the cluster surface and the localized core hole is indeed very important as recently suggested in the literature, so that for a wide range of R the relaxation energy shift is only weakly dependent on metal dielectric properties. The breakdown of the simple classical rule observed below R 20au requires further study both theoretically and under more controlled experimental conditions.

Photoionization cross-section spectra from deep centers in silicon doped with technologically important 4d- and 5d-transition elements were analyzed by the Ridley and Amato lattice coupling model to determine threshold energy and lattice relaxation parameters corresponding to optically induced transitions involving either band. The average optic phonon energy is 50 meV. Electron transitions to the conduction band from the silver, platinum, and gold acceptor centers have, respectively, threshold energies (in meV) E(To) = 550, 226, and 570. For silver and gold, the Huang-Rhys parameter S could not be determined because of a mixture of both allowed and forbidden transitions; for platinum, S = 0.3. Electron transition data from the donor centers of these elements to the conduction band are not available or insufficient to allow analysis of the threshold region.

Field ion Microscopy (FIM) of many of the new high-transition-temperature superconducting oxides has become routine. The older La-Sr-Cu-O type and the newer R-Ba-Cu-O ('1,2,3') type, with R= Y, Yb, Sm, Gd, Dy, Ho, Er, Pr, Eu or La, consistently image well at low temperature in hydrogen FIM and argon FIM at higher temperatures, and less consistently in neon FIM. The newest Bi-Sr-Ca-Cu-O type and Tl-Ba-Ca-Cu-O type can be imaged by hydrogen FIM, but the Bi-based specimens thus far have been mechanically weak and phase identification in both types poses a significant problem. Some details of FIM image interpretation for the '1,2,3' superconductors are addressed in particular, the various degrees of order in the images and the question of identity of the imaging species.

Development of high temperature superconductor - semiconductor contacts with very low contact resistivities is required for microelectronic applications such as circuit interconnects or superconductor - semiconductor - superconductor (S/Semi/S) proximity effect devices. Several thin-film depositon methods have been developed for forming very low resistance contacts to high temperature superconductors. Such a contact could potentially be part of a superconductor - semiconductor contact that relies on an intervening normal metal, spanning superconductor and semiconductor interfaces. Presently the authors are surveying materials commonly used to make ohmic contacts to Si and GaAs for their compatibility with high-temperature superconductors. Prime material characteristics necessary for potential contact structures are (1) low chemical reactivity of the intervening materials with high-temperature superconductors, (2) limited interdiffusion of multilayer constituents, and (3) stable, low contact resistivity, ohmic I-V characteristics.

The authors have recently demonstrated an imaging technique referred to as tunneling stabilized magnetic force microscopy or TSMFM. TSMFM is performed using a scanning tunneling microscope (STM) with a flexible, magnetic, tunneling tip in place of the usual rigid tunneling tip. TSMFM images are therefore combinations of topography and the magnetic forces between the tip and the sample. Room temperature TSMFM images of magnetic bit tracks on a hard disk have 100 nm resolution and are comparable to Bitter patterns made using a ferrofluid. They have built a low temperature STM with the hope of getting TSMFM images of the flux lattice in superconductors. Preliminary TSMFM images of a YBa(2)Cu(3)O(x) (YBCO) film (T(c) - 88 K) in a 50 mT field show that relatively large magnetic forces are acting on the flexible tip while scanning at 48 K.

A series of YBa2Cu3O(7-delta) films has been reactively sputtered on off-axis-cut MgO substrates. All the films were oriented with the c axis normal to the substrate regardless of substrate orientation, indicating that growth dynamics is a major factor influencing film orientation on non-lattice-matched substrates. As the substrate orientation is moved off the (100) direction the films showed a decrease in transition temperature and showed properties indicative of an increased density of weak links. The films grown on high-angle substrates showed better properties than the films grown on low-angle substrates. Films grown on (110) MgO were as good as films grown on (100) MgO.

Irregularities in three crystals (useful in electrooptic detector research) grown in space and in four terrestrial crystals grown under other wise comparable conditions have been observed in high resolution diffraction imaging. The images provide important new clues to the nature and origins of irregularities in each crystal. For two of the materials, mercuric iodide and lead tin telluride, more than one phase (an array of non diffracting inclusions) was observed in terrestrial samples; but the formation of these multiple phases appears to have been suppressed in directly comparable crystals grown in microgravity. The terrestrial seed crystal of triglycine sulfate displayed an unexpected layered structure, which propagated during directly comparable space growth. Terrestrial Bridgman regrowth of gallium arsenide revealed a mesoscopic structure substantially different from that of the original Czochralski material. A directly comparable crystal is to be grown shortly in space.

Simple analytic expressions for the one-dimensional, majority-carrier concentration in a uniformly doped, semi-infinite semiconductor with a charge-accumulated front surface are derived. These expressions are based on the assumption that the effective intrinsic carrier concentration depends only upon the concentration of the majority dopant. Within the framework of this assumption, the expressions derived here are rigorously accurate for intrinsic material, and are accurate to well within 100 parts per million (ppm) for doping concentrations above one trillion/cc. The results of calculations of the majority-carrier concentration carried out using these expressions and using a widely available one-dimensional semiconductor device modeling program are compared to illustrate how these expressions are used for testing the accuracy of iterative solutions of the drift-diffusion equations in the presence of surface fields.

The majority electron and minority hole mobilities have been calculated in GaAs for donor densities between 5 x 10 to the 16th power and 1 x 10 to the 19th power cc. Similarly, the majority hole and minority electron mobilities have been calculated for acceptor densities between 5 x 10 to the 16th power and 1 x 10 to the 20th power cc. All the important scattering mechanisms have been included. The ionized impurity and carrier-carrier scattering processes have been treated with a phase-shift analysis. These calculations are the first to use a phase-shift analysis for minority carriers scattering from majority carriers. The results are in good agreement with experiment, but predict that at high dopant densities minority mobilities should increase with increasing dopant density for a short range of densities. The results are important for device modeling ecause of the need to have values for minority mobilities.

Keywords: *Josephson junctions, *Critical current, High temperature superconductors, Superconducting junctions, Diffraction patterns, Grain boundaries, Magnetic fields, Reprints, Weak links.

The authors discuss the diffraction patterns and other characteristics of the critical current as a function of magnetic field in grain-boundary Josephson barriers. Diffraction patterns occur not just for SIS junctions but for all types of Josephson links, including SNS junctions, which may be present at grain boundaries in high-T(c) superconductors. The authors discuss the generality of the Airy diffraction pattern, which is expected to characterize grain-boundary barriers in bulk material more accurately than the Fraunhofer pattern. The transport critical-current density in many bulk, granular high-T(c) superconductors has a power-law dependence on very low magnetic fields, characteristic of averaged diffraction patterns, and cannot be fitted by an exponential magnetic-field dependence, which may result from the material properties of the barriers.

Surface extended-x-ray-absorption fine structure (SEXAFS) has been combined with scanning tunneling microscopy (STM) to determine both the local and long-range bonding properties of the Si(001)2x1-Sb interface. Sb L(3) edge SEXAFS shows that Sb dimers occupy a modified bridge site on the Si(001) surface with a Sb-Sb near-neighbor distance of 2.88 + or - 0.03 A. Each Sb atom of the dimer is bonded to two Si atoms with a Sb-Si bond length of 2.63 + or - 0.04 A. STM resolves the dimer structure and provides the long-range periodicity of the surface. Low-energy-electron diffraction of vicinal Si(001) shows that the Sb dimer chains run perpendicular to the original Si dimer chains.

The authors compare quantitative results from two methods of solving the micromagnetics equations for 180 deg domain walls. The first method solves the Landau-Lifshitz-Gilbert equation by time integration of the stiff differential equations. The second method uses a relaxation scheme to determine the equilibrium domain wall magnetization configuration. They compare results from these calculations for various damping parameters and discretization mesh densities, and also compare their results with domain wall measurements made using scanning electron microscopy with polarization analysis. They conclude that equilibrium domain wall microstructure is insensitive to the damping parameter used in the time method of solution for domain walls in magnetically soft iron and Permalloy. For large damping parameters, the approach to equilibrium is the same for the time method and the relaxation method. Further, they can obtain metastable equilibrium states with both methods.

The epitaxial growth of ultrathin films of pseudomorphic fcc-Fe on Cu(100) has been studied with several structure sensitive techniques. It has been found that the growth is not via a Frank-van der Merwe (layer-by-layer) mechanism, as proposed by several others, but rather exhibits Fe agglomeration, and at or slightly above 300 K, Cu surface segregation. This manner of growth is shown to be consistent with the generally recognized parameters which affect thin film growth. Several adsorbed gas species are found to strongly affect the growth process and the resulting film morphology. The conditions for growth of the best quality Fe films, sandwiches, and superlattices on Cu(100) are presented and are contrasted with the conditions which have been used in previous studies.

Novel streak-like disruption features restricted to the plane of diffraction have recently been observed in synchrotron radiation diffraction from undoped, semi-insulating gallium arsenide crystals. These features were identified as ensembles of very thin platelets (or interfaces) normal to the various 110 directions, and a structural model consisting of antiphase domain boundaries was proposed. The other principal characteristics observed in high resolution monochromatic synchrotron radiation diffraction images are: (quasi)cellular structure, linear low angle subgrain boundaries in 110 directions, and stripes in a 110 direction, as well as systematic differences in the acceptance angle for various diffractions. When these detailed structures are considered together, a unifying picture of these features emerges. That is, the presence of ensembles of thin 110 antiphase platelet regions or boundaries is generally consistent not only with the streak-like diffraction features but with all other observations of defects as well. For the formation of such regions, the authors propose two mechanisms, operating in parallel, that appear to be consistent with the various defect features observed by a variety of techniques.

The Mossbauer effect of oxygen-depleted YBa2Cu3O(7-x) and PrBa2Cu3O(7-x) doped with 3% (57)Fe has been investigated at room temperature. A manifold of quadrupole-split spectra has been found, wjose parameters are in general agreement with those found by other workers. In addition, the Mossbauer spectra show that a fraction of the Fe sites develop magnetic order at room temperature when the oxygen content is reduced. It is demonstrated that the observed asymmetries in the Mossbauer spectra can be the result of a preferential alignment of the platelike crystallites that arises during the normal sample preparation process. The tendency to bond with the oxygen atoms is presumed to be responsible for the discreteness of the Mossbauer spectra as a function of oxygen depletion.

The paper reports on irregularities found in three crystals grown in space, in four crystals grown entirely on the ground, and compares the two sets. Irregularities have been observed in mercuric iodide, lead tin telluride, triglycine sulfate, and gallium arsenide by high resolution synchrotron x-radiation diffraction imaging. Radiation detectors made from mercuric iodide crystals grown in microgravity have been reported to perform far better than conventional detectors grown from the same material under full gravity. Effort is now underway to reproduce these 'space' crystals, optimize their properties, and extend comparable superiority to other types of material.

Oxides and Oxide Superconductors: Elastic and Related Properties.

Keywords: *High temperature superconductors, *Superconductivity, Electron phonon interactions, Elastic properties, Debye temperature, Bulk modulus, Barium titanates, Strontium titanates, *Yttrium barium cuprates, Kresin model, Born model.

Using both measurements and modeling, the elastic and related properties of some oxides and oxide superconductors were studied. The polycrystal elastic constants were measured using a MHz-frequency pulse-echo method between 295 and 4 K and corrected to the void-free state by using a model for a composite material containing spherical particles. The elastic moduli of the high-T(c) superconductor Y1Ba2Cu3O7 (YBCO) were compared with that of oxides, especially the perovskites BaTiO3 and SrTiO3, which are crystal-structure building blocks for the YBCO superconductor. The bulk moduli were also calculated using a Born ionic model with two energy terms: electrostatic (Madelung) and ion-core-repulsion. The calculated bulk modulus of YBCO, 98 GPa, agrees well with measurement, 101 GPa. Based on monocrystal measurements combined with analysis-theory, elastic stiffnesses C(ij) for orthorhombic YBCO were estimated. The bulk modulus obtained from the estimated C(ij) by the Voigt-Reuss-Hill averaging method agrees with the monocrystal measurement. From the measured polycrystalline elastic constants, the Debye characteristic temperatures were calculated.

Keywords: *High temperature superconductors, *Superconductors, Band theory, Single crystals, Reprints, *Bismuth strontium calcium cuprates, Tunneling gap anisotropy.

A two-band model, in which the pair constituents in one band are linked via double intermediate boson (IB) exchange with a third fermion in the other band, is invoked to understand the tunneling-gap anisotropy observed in Bi2Sr2CaCu2O8 single crystals. The coordinates of the two IBs and of the third fermion are integrated out, leading to effective pair correlations. The theory is presently in agreement with the data and subject to further experimental test via more precise measurements. Within the model, present data imply that the IB cut-off omega $>$ 0.3 eV. The observed broad i.r. excitation centered at approximately 3000/cm is taken as a candidate for the (possibly composite) IB. Experimental implications are discussed in a general context.

Brillouin light scattering and ferromagnetic resonance have been used to measure the magnetic field dependence of the magnon frequency at room temperature for 3 monolayer thick films of fcc Fe(001) grown by means of molecular beam epitaxy on Cu(001) substrates. These films exhibit a strong uniaxial magnetic anisotropy which causes the magnetization to be oriented perpendicular to the film plane in zero applied field. Four specimens were grown on copper substrates prepared using a chemical polishing technique which avoided the use of abrasives; this treatment greatly reduced the density of etch pits on the copper surface. The uniaxial anisotropies found for these specimens were very consistent and comparable to that previously measured for the best film grown on a mechanically polished copper substrate. There is evidence that substrate smoothness is improved, and hence that the uniaxial anisotropy is increased, when the substrate is covered with a few monolayers of epitaxial copper before the iron films are grown.

Field Ion Microscopy (FIM) specimens of '1,2,3'-type high-Tc superconducting materials, typically have an asymmetrical shape. This results from the anisotropic properties, which are involved in the preparation techniques. As a consequence of this shape, the magnification and resolution depend on the direction in the FIM image. Assuming that the elliptical poles in published micrographs are due to tip shape, the authors calculate an asymmetry in the magnification as large as a factor of four. Therefore, the current image interpretation is revisited quantitatively, keeping in mind the magnification asymmetry. The strong effect enhances the striped appearance of the images, and has not been fully recognized so far.

Intrinsic carrier concentrations of narrow-gap Hg(1-x)Cd(x)Te alloys (0.17 = or < x = or < 0.30) have been calculated as a function of temperature between 0 and 300 K by using the new nonlinear temperature dependence of the energy gap obtained previously by two-photon magneto-absorption measurements for samples with 0.24 = or < x = or < 0.26. The authors report here experimental values for E(sub g) (x,T) for samples with x = 0.20 and 0.23 obtained by one-photon magneto-absorption measurements. These data confirm the validity of the new E(sub g) (x,T) relationship for these x values. In this range of composition and temperature, the energy gap of mercury cadmium telluride is small, and very accurate values are needed for the gap to obtain reliable values for the intrinsic carrier density. Large percentage differences exist between their new calculations and previous values for n(sub i) at low temperatures. Even at 77 K, differences approaching 10 percent exist, confirming the importance of using the new n(sub i) results for materials and device characterization and a proper understanding of device operation in long-wavelength materials.

Neutron diffraction techniques have been used to study the magnetic order of the Cu ions in a single crystal of Sm2CuO4. The measurements revealed the development of long-range magnetic order of the Cu moments at T(sub N) = 280 + or - 1 K, with a relatively simple antiferromagnetic configuration of spins as found in Nd2CuO4 and Pr2CuO4. However, the spin directions in Sm2CuO4 are rotated by 90 degrees from the spin directions in Nd2CuO4 and Pr2CuO4. The detailed spin structure can be either collinear or noncollinear, and in these tetragonal systems it is not possible to distinguish between them with the present neutron diffraction data on multidomain samples. Measurements demonstrate that there are no spin reorientations below the Neel temperature, in contrast to the behavior found for Nd2CuO4.

The electronic structure of the materials being measured has a strong effect on the spectroscopy of the interface between them measured by ballistic electron emission microscopy (BEEM). Specific calculations for CoSi2/Si(111) and NiSi2/Si(111) based on the calculated band structures of the materials illustrate some of the observable effects due to band structures, particularly of the overlayer. The BEEM spectra for CoSi2/Si(111) show a delayed onset due to a mismatch of the states near the conduction band minimum in the Si. The spectra for NiSi2/Si(111) show structure due to a decrease in the density of states in the NiSi2 at about 1.8 eV above the Fermi level.

The effect of surface free energy on the orientation of nuclei on a substrate is examined. In general, the orientation of the nuclei is not determined by minimizing the nucleus-substrate interfacial free energy alone: all interfacial anisotropies must be considered. That orientation preferences should result from anisotropies in the substrate-nucleus interfacial free energies is obvious, but it was found that strong orientation effects are present even if the energy is assumed to be independent of the nucleus orientation, provided that the nutrient-nucleus interfacial free energies are anisotropic. Furthermore, varying the magnitude of even an isotropic nucleus-substrate energy will change the orientation of the nuclei. The theory points to some simple rules for prediction of nucleation orientations.

The authors have carried out a study of the low-temperature magnetization and spin-wave dispersion in the amorphous metallic ferromagnet Fe(78)B(13)Si(9). The temperature dependence of the magnetization was measured with a vibrating sample magnetometer and the spin-wave measurements were carried out using inelastic neutron scattering techniques. The magnetization is found to obey the usual law for M(sub s)(T), while the spin waves follow the conventional ferromagnetic dispersion relation for E(sub q). The spin wave stiffness constant D(T) is found to be substantially larger than the value inferred from the magnetization data, similar to the behavior observed in other Invar-type materials.

The analysis of strain fields surrounding both stationary and propagating cracks is presented. Series expansions of the static and dynamic strain fields are developed. Gage orientation angles are then studied to optimize the strain response. The orientation angles are found to be dependent on gage type and material. Algorithms are developed which use the temporal or spatial strain variations to extract fracture parameters. The accuracy of the parameter determinations is shown to be excellent, and limits are placed on the validity of the developed methods. The methods are then applied to the analysis of a large scale crack arrest test conducted in a pressure vessel steel. The behavior of the crack-tip position with time and the propagation toughness with time, temperature and position are determined. From this information, details of the conditions at crack arrest are extracted. The propagation toughness-crack-velocity relation is then constructed.

Two numerical simulations of a model of the high-strain-rate torsion test are discussed, one with isothermal temperature boundary conditions, the other with adiabatic boundary conditions. It is shown that a moving boundary of rigid unloading, starting from isothermal ends of the thin-walled tube, caused by heat conduction, is a plausible mechanism for shear band formation during the test.

Applied J-integral values for a surface cracked tensile panel are experimentally evaluated by measuring strain and displacement quantities along an instrumented contour located on the longitudinal symmetry plane. Nonlinear, 3-D, finite-element analyses are employed to obtain corresponding estimates of the contour and area integral contributions to a 3-D J-integral. Finite element results indicate that the area integral contribution is negligibly small on the symmetry plane; the fracture driving force is thus adequately characterized by the experimental contour values. Detailed comparisons of the experimental and numerical results (crack mouth opening displacement, J-values, and strains along the contour) reveal that the one-quarter symmetric, finite element model accurately predicts the panel response for overall (gauge length) strains approaching 1.6 times the material yield strain, beyond which the observed deformation patterns exhibited globally asymmetric shear bands.

An enriched finite element model for linear elastic fracture mechanics is developed for a mixed variational statement. The independent approximations for the displacement and stress components are enriched by adding the near-field analytic expressions for a cracked body to the polynomial approximations of a conventional element. This allows for an accurate representation of the stress and displacement fields near the crack tip and also results in the direct calculation of the appropriate stress intensity factors. The accuracy of the formulation is demonstrated through several numerical examples.

The fluctuation-dissipation theorem is applied to the case of low-dissipation mechanical oscillators, wose losses are dominated by processes occurring inside the material of which the oscillators are made. In the common case of losses described by a complex spring constant with a constant imaginary part, the thermal noise displacement power spectrum is steeper by one power of omega than is predicted by a velocity-damping model. The author constructs models for the thermal noise spectra of systems with more than one mode of vibration, and evaluate a model of a specific design of pendulum suspension for the test masses in a gravitational-wave interferometer.

A numerical study of a one-dimensional model of the high strain-rate torsion test shows that a moving boundary of rigid unloading, starting from the ends of the thin-walled tubular specimen, is a plausible mechanism for adiabatic shear band formation during the test. Even though the dimensionless thermal diffusivity parameter is very small, the moving boundary is due to heat transfer from the specimen through its ends, which are assumed to be isothermal heat sinks. The mathematical model is based on a physical model of thermoelastic-plastic flow and a phenomenological Arrhenius model for the plastic flow surface. The numerical technique used is the semi-discretization method of lines.

Recent experimental studies have shown that strain gages can be employed to determine either static or dynamic stress intensity factors, with relatively simple experiments. The paper describes an analysis method for determining stress intensity factors associated with a propagating crack. The analysis is based on a three parameter representation of the strain field near the crack tip. An algorithm is developed where triangulation is used to precisely locate the crack tip position. The algorithm also includes an iteration scheme which permits an accurate determination of two key parameters in the series representation of the strain field. The new method of analysis is demonstrated in a dynamic experiment with a high strength 4340 alloy steel.

Spatial resolution and strain sensitivity were improved by decreasing the laser beam diameter, using a separate camera for each diffraction peak, and using frame averaging techniques.

The optical response is also shown in terms of J for a power law hardening material where a plastic region has developed and small scale yielding is not valid. Design concepts for very simple optical gages to measure both K(I) and J are introduced.

The National Bureau of Standards is working to develop a nondestructive test method for finding flaws within heterogenous materials, such as concrete. The method, which is referred to as the impact-echo method, involves introducing transient stress waves into a test object by mechanical impact (point source) and monitoring reflections of the waves from internal defects and external boundaries using a displacement transducer (point receiver) which is located close to the impact point. The impact-echo test is a simple procedure; however, successful interpretation of recorded surface displacement waveforms requires an understanding of the interaction of transient stress waves with internal defects. To develop a basis for the method, Green's function solutions, finite element solutions, and experimental studies of transient stress wave propagation in solid plates and in plates containing flaws have been carried out. The abstract will discuss some significant findings of the finite element studies.

The paper presents the mathematical and computational basis of a method for experimentally identifying the dynamic behavior of linear structural systems. The method consists of exciting the structure with specific pulses and reconstructing the dynamic Green's functions by deconvolution of the measured response. The reconstruction procedure involves the solution of an ill-posed integral equation in the presence of noise. Inverse Gaussian functions, which have mathematical properties that render the deconvolution problem tractable, are used as probing pulses. Two examples are presented for which dynamic Green's functions are reconstructed from synthetic response data: (1) a non-dispersive medium consisting of a mechanical slider with free body motion, and (2), a network that may be representative of a large orbiting structure, with rigidly connected torsional members and Timoshenko beams. It is shown that residual effects of noise that may be detectable in the reconstructed Green's functions, are effectively smoothed out when these functions are used to predict the response to forces such as may be induced by control systems. Finally, an example is presented of deconvolution implemented in slow motion.

A procedure based on the theory of generalized functions is developed which allows the calculation of dynamic Green's functions for discrete and continuous elastic systems with rigid body degrees of freedom. For any given degree of freedom the procedure divides the Fourier transform of the dynamic Green's function into two parts. The first part contains the singularity due to the rigid body degree of freedom. Its time domain counterpart is obtained in closed form. The second part exhibits no singularities, and its time domain counterpart is obtained by numerical integration using a Fast Fourier Transform routine. The procedure is applied to two systems for which closed form solutions are also obtained: a system consisting of two point masses connected by an elastic spring which slide without friction on a horizontal plane, and a non-dispersive mechanical slider with elastic deformations due to shear strain. The agreement between the results yielded by the proposed procedure and the closed form solutions is shown to be excellent. The procedure is then used to caluclate the dynamic Green's function for the tip displacement of a dispersive medium consisting of a flexible robot manipulator with the mechanical properties of a Timoshenko beam.

A polynomial series expansion for displacements is used in conjunction with the Rayleigh-Ritz energy method to produce buckling and post-buckling stress solutions for an elliptically-shaped surface layer that has been delaminated from the main load-bearing body. Plate deformations are induced by a combined in-plane displacement field applied to the plate boundary and normal pressure. Convergence of the plate solution is assessed by systematically increasing the number of displacement terms in the series expansion. The convergence of membrane and bending stresses at the plate boundary was generally slow and nonuniform. The degrees-of-freedom necessary for a satisfactory solution typically increase with increasing complexity or magnitude of the plate deformations. By employing as many as 77 displacement terms, practically exact stress solutions are obtained for a wide variety of basic delamination plate problems. The proposed solution procedure is highly efficient and economical, and it may be easily extended to other plate geometries of loading conditions.

The large-deflection plate solution developed in Part I is used here to study the buckling and post-buckling deformation and stress characteristics of an elliptically-shaped surface layer that has been delaminated from a large material body. The economical, yet accurate nature of the solution, together with available graphic routines, has made it possible to present, figuratively, a comprehensive description of the plate behavior. The conditions for a layer-substrate overlap and the variations of membrane and bending stresses along the plate boundary are emphasized. Deformations were induced either by a normal pressure or a biaxial displacement field applied to the plate boundary. The problem variables are plate size and shape, details of load biaxiality, and load level.

A comparison of force measurements performed at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, USA, and at the Physikalisch-Technische Bundesanstalt, Germany is reported. The focus of the study was the intercomparison of the forces realized by the two Institutes rather than the measurement process. The transfer standards used in the comparison consisted of force transducers and associated readout instrumentation. The results of the intercomparison reveal that over a range of 50 kN to 4.5 MN, the forces realized at NIST and at PTB compare favorably. For forces up to 900 kN the agreement is within + or - 40 ppm; above 900 kN the agreement is within + or - 100 ppm.

Measurement Service C.1 from the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) publication SP 250 provides calibrations for customer-owned ionization chambers so that they may be used to determine absorbed dose to water in (60)Co gamma-ray beams. The calibrations are based on calorimetric measurement of absorbed dose to graphite in a graphite phantom. Transformation of the calibrations to a water phantom is made with a specially-designed graphite ionization chamber, and requires knowledge of photon mass attenuation coefficients and the perturbation of the graphite chamber in the water medium. The determination of these quantities is described in detail, along with the operational techniques normally used to transfer the calibration to customer-owned chambers. Appendix A lists experimental data used to test the photon-fluence scaling theorem. Appendices B, C, and D describe international comparisons of the chamber calibrations, and Appendix E shows a sample calibration report.

High-resolution angle-resolved electron spectroscopy with synchrotron radiation has been used to study the angular distributions of resonant-Auger processes near the core-level thresholds Ar 2p, Kr 3d and Xe 4d. Angular-distribution parameters (beta) were measured for all resolved peaks in the electron spectra, and large negative values of beta were found for some peaks. A quantitative method for calculating the angular-distribution parameters is described and results of calculations for the Ar 2p(3/2) -> 4s resonant-Auger spectrum are compared with the experimental results.

Keywords: *Magnetic recording, Metal films, Iron, Reprints, Surface magnetism, Imaging techniques, High resolution, Scanning tunneling microscopy, Magnetic films.

The authors have used a scanning tunneling microscope (STM) to record and image magnetic regions on the surface of a hard disk. The usual rigid STM tip was replaced by a compliant magnetized Fe film tip. As a result, tunneling images were combinations of the surface topography and variations in the magnetic force between the Fe film tip and the disk surface. The authors believe that the recording process relied on maintaining the proximity of the magnetized Fe film tip near the disk surface. Apparently, the magnetic field was focused near the Fe film tip with sufficient intensity to change the surface magnetization of the disk. The authors have recorded spots on the disk within a 500 nm X 500 nm area. These spots were subsequently imaged with the same STM tip. Their best magnetic image resolution was 20 nm. The compliance of the Fe film tips was such that image contrast due to variation of the magnetic force on the tip corresponded to z motions of the piezoelectric translator as large as 50 nm.

Recent extensive measurements of the thermal conductivity of argon and nitrogen have enabled us to evaluate the first density correction as a function of temperature and to compare it with a theoretical prediction. The prediction follows from a previously published microscopically based theory, which includes effects due to collisional transfer, collisions among three molecules, and monomer-dimer collisions. The first density correction was evaluated for a Lennard-Jones interaction potential. An ad hoc modification of the theory accounts for contributions to the thermal conductivity from internal degrees of freedom. The comparison shows good agreement over a wide range of temperatures.

Keywords: *Argon, *Thermal conductivity, *Thermal diffusivity, *Specific heat, Gases, Reprints, Transient hot wire technique.

The paper presents new absolute measurements of the thermal conductivity and of the thermal diffusivity of gaseous argon obtained with a transient hot-wire instrument. The authors measured seven isotherms in the supercritical dense gas at temperatures between 157 and 324 K with pressures up to 70 MPa and densities up to 32 mol/L and five isotherms in the vapor at temperatures between 103 and 142 K with pressures up to the saturation vapor pressure. The instrument is capable of measuring the thermal conductivity with an accuracy better than 1% and thermal diffusivity with an accuracy better than 5%. Heat capacity results were determined from the simultaneously measured values of thermal conductivity and thermal diffusivity and from the density calculated from measured values of pressure and temperature from an equation of state. The heat capacities presented in the paper, with a nominal accuracy of 5%, prove that heat capacity data can be obtained successfully with the transient hot wire technique over a wide range of fluid states. The technique will be invaluable when applied to fluids which lack specific heat data or an adequate equation of state.

A moon-based laser interferometer for detecting gravitational radiation could detect signals in the band 0.1 to 10,000 Hz. A preliminary evaluation of the noise budget for an optimistic antenna design is reported here and compared to that for other planned gravitational wave interferometers. Over most of the frequency range, the sensitivity is controlled by the thermal noise in the test mass suspensions. As pointed out by others, the most important role of a lunar antenna would be the improved angular resolution made possible by the long baseline to terrestrial antennas.

Space Marching Difference Schemes in the Nonlinear Inverse Heat Conduction Problem.
A. S. Carasso. 21 Nov 90, 41p NISTIR-4482

Keywords: *Conduction, *Gun barrels, Nonlinear differential equations, Finite difference theory, One-dimensional calculations, Mathematical models, Heat transfer, Fourier analysis, Error analysis, Ill posed problems, Inverse problems.

The Lax-Richtmyer theory is used to study the error amplification properties of 18 space marching finite difference schemes, for the 1-D nonlinear inverse heat conduction problem. A non-dimensional parameter Omega, involving the time step Delta t, the effective thermal diffusivity alpha, and the distance l from the sensor to the active surface, provides a measure of the numerical difficulty of the inverse calculation. All 18 schemes are unstable and blow-up like 10(sup lambda Omega), where the constant lambda depends on the particular numerical method. However, there are substantial differences in the lambda's, and some newly constructed algorithms, employing forward time differences at nonadjacent mesh points, are shown to produce relatively low values of lambda. Using synthetic noisy data, a nonlinear reconstruction problem is considered for which Omega = 25. This problem simulates heat transfer in gun barrels when a shell is fired. It is shown that while most of the 18 schemes cannot recover the thermal pulses at the gun tube wall, two of the new methods provide reasonably accurate results. A tendency to underestimate peak values in fast, narrow thermal pulses, is also noted.

The behavior of the transition elements and the lanthanides is described in terms of an independent electron model. The properties of the transition elements and the lanthanides which are associated with orbital collapse are described in terms of an independent electron model. Special attention is focused on elements at the beginning of the transition period, such as Cs, Ba, and La, to show that the dramatic changes in such properties as the photoabsorbtion can be explained in terms of orbital collapse, provided one carefully treats exchange and correlation effects. Theoretical models are compared with experimental results in isoelectronic and isonuclear systems.

The 1986 CODATA set of values entirely replaces its immediate predecessor, that recommended for international use by CODATA in 1973. The latter was based on the 1973 least-squares adjustment of the fundamental constants which was also carried out by the authors under the auspices and guidance of the Task Group.

While X-ray emission spectroscopy is a relatively old technique, it takes on important new characteristics when samples are selectively excited by a carefully prepared beam of X-rays. The method is made practical by the availability of synchrotron radiation sources and it extends the capabilities of the traditional technique. Both the energy and the polarization of the excitation X-rays can have significant effects on the emission spectra. Selective control of these parameters can provide specific information on both the electronic structure and the atomic structure of molecules or solids. Examples of the new types of studies include: satellite free X-ray emission, multi-vacancy excitation, polarized X-ray excitation and emission, and state selective excitation of neutral atoms and molecules.

The coincident electrofission (e,e'f) cross sections of (233,238)U were measured in the excitation range 150-550 MeV. The probability of fission was found to be near unity in the delta resonance region (250-550 MeV), but less than unity in the quasifree scattering region (150-250 MeV). The data are analyzed with a model based on the quasifree and delta reaction mechanisms. An excitation energy of 25 MeV is found for the residual nucleus in the quasifree region and over 40 MeV in the delta region.

In dissipative systems, chaotic trajectories are locally unstable in that they show a sensitive dependence on initial conditions but globally stable in that they are represented by attractors. The global stability of the chaotic state is examined in the neighborhood of an interior crisis using the rf-biased Josephson junction as an example. A measure of global stability is developed by considering the response of the system to thermal noise. In the presence of noise, the system occasionally escapes from the region of state space containing the attractor and the temperature dependence of the average escape time is characterized by an activation energy. The activation energy is a useful measure of the global stability of the chaotic state, being analogous to the barrier height for a particle in a potential well.

The authors demonstrate the utility of the close-coupling approximation, usually applied to scattering problems, for calculations of molecular bound states. Their primary test case is the doublet Sigma (sub u)(sup +) state of H2(1-). While limited to Hartree-Fock accuracy, their analysis of this resonant state within the bound region parallels closely the results from more precise quantum-chemical calculations. Specifically, the crossing between the neutral and negative-ion curves occurs at an internuclear separation of 3.025 a.u. in their calculation, in good agreement with a multireference configuration-interaction approach of previous authors. The shape and total energy of the anion curve, when corrected for by the correlation energy of the target at the crossing, is also in good agreement with earlier results. The method is then extended into the unbound or resonant-state region by studying the shape-resonance behavior of scattering eigenphase sums.

Non-Newtonian behavior in a sheared simple fluid is reviewed briefly. The author points out that such behavior is more often associated with fluids of very complex structure, such as polymers. The concept of the Maxwell relaxation time is introduced and it is shown that the product of the time and a shear rate is a key parameter that indicates if a fluid will display non-Newtonian characteristics, regardless of molecular structure. The author discusses the distorted structure factor of a dense two-dimensional soft disk liquid undergoing Couette flow. The structure factor is determined experimentally by light scattering from the output of a nonequilibrium molecular dynamic simulation. The distorted pair correlation function is also discussed.

The result, 19931.924794(45)/cm, represents an order of magnitude improvement over previous measurements and provides a sensitive test of two-electron QED effects. The result shows an unexpectedly large deviation from theoretical prediction. The authors derive improved term values for a number of low-lying helium levels. All levels with n=2 show significant deviations from theory that are correlated with the size of calculated two-electron contributions to the Lamb shifts.

Measurements of the ratio of the rate coefficient for charge transfer between (3)He(1+) and (4)He to that for the reverse process have been made in the temperature range 8 K approx = or < T approx = or < 80 K. A 1.1-meV difference in the ionization potential of these species leads to an endothermicity in the forward direction of the reaction, and these experiments constitute the only measurements of a threshold resulting from such a small endothermicity. In addition, a limited number of direct measurements of the rate coefficients for these processes have been made and are included here. The measurements were done in a cooled Penning trap using Fourier transform spectroscopy of the axial trapping frequency. The measurements are compared to theoretical estimates.

The authors have extended their previous work on an optical potential method to electron and positron scattering from neon. In addition, they have modified the approach to include the diagonal potentials previously neglected. This required the use of a numerical form of the Green function. Comparison with recent experimental measurements with positrons indicates the necessity of including absorption effects at higher energies, although these effects appear to be smaller for neon than they were for argon. At energies just above the inelastic excitation thresholds, however, the picture is not so clear at the moment.

The volume presents the contributions of the participants in the Sixth International Swarm Seminar, held August 2-5, 1989, at the Webb Institute in Glen Cove, New York. The Swarm Seminars are traditionally held as relatively small satellite conferences of the International Conference on the Physics of Electronic and Atomic Collisions (ICPEAC) which occurs every two years. The 1989 ICPEAC took place in New York City prior to the Swarm Seminar. The focus of the Swarm Seminars has been on basic research relevant to understanding the transport of charged particles, mainly electrons and ions, in weakly ionized gases. This is a field that tends to bridge the gap between studies of fundamental binary atomic and molecular collision processes and studies of electrical breakdown or discharge phenomena in gases. Topics included in the 1989 seminar ranged the gamut from direct determinations of charged-particle collision cross sections to use of cross sections and swarm parameters to model the behavior of electrical gas discharges.

Experiments at NIST, whose goal is to realize frequency standards of high accuracy using stored ions, are briefly summarized. In one experiment, an rf oscillator is locked to a nuclear spin-flip hyperfine transition in (9)Be(1+) ions which are stored in a Penning trap and sympathetically laser-cooled. Uncertainty in Doppler shifts is estimated to be less than 5 x 10(sup -15). In a second experiment, a stable laser is used to probe an electric quadrupole transition (frequency = 1.07 x 10(sup 15) Hz) in a single laser-cooled (199)Hg(1+) ion stored in a Paul trap. The measured Q value of the transition is approximately 10(sup 13).

The article is devoted to a description of various ionization processes which may be studied in excited atoms. Some of these processes are: photoionization, autoionization, and collisional ionization. The development of the field has been accelerated by combining tunable lasers, which excite the atomic species, with synchrotron radiation, which probes the excited atoms. The authors concentrate on the two-step photoionization in free atoms where one electron is promoted to an outer orbital and another is promoted either to a highly excited state which subsequently autoionizes, or to a continum state.

Cross-Validation Procedure for Stopping the EM Algorithm and Deconvolution of Neutron Depth Profiling Spectra.

K. Coakley. 1991, 7p
Pub. in IEEE (Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers) Transactions on Nuclear Science 38, n1 p9-15 Feb 91.

Keywords: *Neutron spectra, *Image reconstruction, Stopping rules(Mathematics), Iterations, Reprints, Emission tomography, EM algorithm, Deconvolution, Depth profiles.

The iterative EM algorithm is used to deconvolve neutron depth profiling spectra. Because of statistical noise in the data, artifacts in the estimated particle emission rate profile appear after too many iterations of the EM algorithm. To avoid artifacts, the EM algorithm is stopped using a cross-validation procedure. The data are split into two independent halves. The EM algorithm is applied to one half of the data to get an estimate of the emission rates. The algorithm is stopped when the conditional likelihood of the other half of the data passes through its maximum. The roles of the two halves of the data are then switched to get a second estimate of the emission rates. The two estimates are then averaged.

Quantum jumps in laser-cooled, trapped, mercury ions were observed. These quantum jumps were used to infer some quantum properties of the electromagnetic field, such as photon antibunching and sub-Poissonian photon statistics. A single mercury ion was cooled to the ground (zero-point) energy in the harmonic effective potential of the trap.

Keywords: *Uncertainty, *Accuracy, Measurement, Recommendations, Standards, Calibration.

The formulation of the 'uncertainty' of a reported value always involves a certain degree of arbitrariness, depending primarily on how the value is going to be used. Currently there are at least two schools of thought on the subject: physicists interested in detecting differences among result are in favor of the recommendations of the International Bureau of Weights and Measures (BIPM/CIPM 1981), whereas those involved in calibration work and routine measurements follow the orthodox method (see e.g., NBS Special Publication 644). In the note, the suggestion is made to use the word 'accuracy/inaccuracy' for standards that follow BIPM's recommendation, and the word 'uncertainty' for standards that follow the orthodox method. It is believed that the use of different terms for distinct purposes will resolve some of the basic difficulties facing international groups who are attempting to write their own standards.

The transverse magnetoresistance of several composite conductors containing a large single filament of pure aluminum in a matrix of Al-Fe-Ce has been measured at 4 K to fields of 10 T. The magnetoresistance (delta R/R) of the composite is very large, rising to 55 in the 'worst' case. Previous measurements on pure polycrystalline aluminum have always shown a rapidly saturating behavior with a very small linear component; delta R/R rarely exceeds a value of 5-6. In addition, the magnetoresistance of the composite samples shows a structure as the field is rotated around the current axis.

The possibility that different realms of physics are described by distinct quantization constants is considered. From the consistency of existing data, the authors infer limits on the differences between hypothetically distinct quantization constants for different elementary particles. Since the existence of multiple Planck constants implies violations of space-time symmetries, these limits may be viewed as precise tests of fundamental conservation laws, including the conservation of linear momentum and energy.

Much of the X-ray work on synchrotron-radiation beam lines is still done using ion chambers as detectors. Silicon PIN photodiodes offer considerable advantages over ion chambers for many applications. In addition to greater efficiency over a wide energy range (1-20 keV), they possess a flat configuration, large areas, an absence of bias requirements, high dynamic range, and compatability with ultrahigh vacuum. The researchers have characterized the properties of several commercial PIN photodiodes at X-ray energies, have had diodes commercially produced which were specialized for use in synchrotron beam lines, and have produced new photodiode devices for synchrotron-radiation applications. The performance of these devices was reviewed over extended periods of time in beam-line control and as detectors in experiments.

A Laser-Interferometer Gravitational-Wave Observatory (LIGO) is planned for operation in the United States, with two antennas separated by several thousand kilometers. Each antenna would incorporate laser interferometers with 4 km arm lengths, operating in vacuum. The frequency range covered initially would be from a few tens of Hz to a few kHz, with possible extension to lower frequencies later. Similar systems are likely to be constructed in Europe, and there is a possibility of at least one system in Asia or Australia. It will be possible to determine the direction to a gravitational wave source by measuring the difference in the arrival times at the various antennas for burst signals or the phase difference for short duration nearly periodic signals. The addition of an antenna on the Moon, operating in support of the Earth-based antennas, would improve the angular resolution for burst signals by about a factor 50 in the plane containing the source, the Moon, and the Earth.

A promising solution to the problems of regenerator ineffectiveness in the 4K to 15K region is the use of saran carbon with adsorbed helium as the regenerator material. Preliminary measurements indicate that this material has a higher volumetric specific heat than any other known material in the 4K to 15K temperature range. Furthermore, the estimated thermal conductivity of saran carbon is low enough to permit its use as a continuous matrix between the hot and cold ends of the regenerator, but it does not adversely affect the longitudinal conduction heat loss along the regenerator length. An NBS computer regenerator program has been used to show that a saran carbon/ adsorbed helium, parallel-plate geometry regenerator is likely to be superior to any other known regenerator for cooling in the 4K to 15K temperature region.

In the NBS-Los Alamos racetrack microtron (RTM), the 17 MeV electron beam, which has made one pass through the RTM linac, is deflected 180 deg in one end magnet and is returned to the same end of the (standing wave) linac for a second pass. A pair of dipole magnets on the linac axis compensate for the beam displacement caused by the end magnet so that the beam enters the linac on axis. These two magnets are designed to have equal field integrals in order to produce a pure displacement. Matching the field integrals was complicated by the quite different widths of the two magnets which have different beam clearance requirements. In addition, the wider magnet contains a quadrupole coil for beam steering. Design considerations are presented. Magnetic field measurements show that critical design goals have been achieved.

Angle-resolved electron spectroscopy with the help of synchrotron radiation has been used to study resonate Auger processes near the core shells of Ar2p, Kr3d and Xe4d. Results for the lowest energy resonances have received special attention: argon (Ar2p(3/2)->4s) at a photon energy of 244.4 eV, krypton (Kr3d(5/2)->6p) at 91.2 eV, and xenon (Xe4d(5/2)->6p) at 65.1 eV. The angular distribution parameters, beta, are evaluated for each of the resolved Auger peaks. Most striking is the occurrence of large negative beta values for some of the higher kinetic energy peaks. The results are most apparent under high electron resolution. The beta values near -1 are justified in terms of the angular-momentum transfer theory, which predicts beta = -1 for parity unfavored transitions. Results on the Auger spectra are also given at lower kinetic energies, for shake-up states, and for higher energy resonances, especially those involving vacancies in the core shells of the lower spin states.

Recent measurements have shown that the angular distribution of Auger electrons observed in near threshold resonant excitation with energy resolution adequate to partially resolve the multiplet structure corresponding to final core states exhibited a marked change in the angular distributions as a function of final electron energy. A method of calculating these angular distributions is proposed which extends the formalism developed for treating angular distributions in photoeffect via a separation into parity favored and unfavored components. As an example of the use of the method, calculations are presented for the 2p-4s resonant Auger process in Argon and compared with recent experiments.

X-ray emission from selectively excited core hole states in molecular gases can exhibit strong polarization and anisotropic angular distributions. These effects are attributable to the creation of an aligned ensemble of excited molecules within the otherwise randomly oriented molecular gas. This alignment can be created because the resonant excitation probability of core hole states can be strongly dependent upon the instantaneous molecular orientation. This effect presents a novel opportunity for studying molecular symmetries and the structure of matter in disordered phases.

It is shown that the inclusion of QED corrections for the M-shell electrons substantially improves the agreement between multiconfiguration Dirac-Fock calculations and experimental values on the spin-orbit splitting in the ground state (3s(2)3p(2P)) of Al-like ions. Recommended values of the spin-orbit splitting are presented for Co(14+) through Xe(41+).

Keywords: Multicharged ions, Oscillator strengths, Excited states, Relativistic effects, Energy levels, Correlation, Reprints, *Beryllium-like ions.

Relativistic and correlation effects cause several inversions of the 'triplet' and 'singlet' J=1 levels in the 2s3p configuration of Be-like ions. The authors have studied these effects in the range of atomic number Z = 6 - 54 using both relativistic and nonrelativistic multiconfiguration wave functions. Theoretical predictions of energies of these levels with respect to the 2s(2) singlet S(0) ground level are compared with experimental data, and the authors conclude that overall, the predictions for the ions having Z = or > 12 are probably more accurate than the available measurements. Calculated oscillator strengths for these resonance transitions are also reported. Near cadmium (Z = 48), the authors confirm still another inversion due to the complete dominance of relativistic effects, which has been reported earlier in the literature.

The authors have measured the temperature of a gas of sodium atoms in 'optical molasses' to be as low as 43 + or - 20 (micro)K. Surprisingly, this strongly violates the generally accepted theory of Doppler cooling which predicts a limit of 240 (micro)K. Several complementary measurements of the ballistic motion of atoms released from the molasses were used to determine the temperature.

The double crystal spectrometer GAMS4 in combination with the ILL high flux reactor has been used to determine the lifetimes of the 3074 keV (2 sub 3, sup +) and 3720 keV (1,2)+ states in (54)Cr. The initial recoil energy of about 0.5 keV imparted by the primary gamma-radiation after thermal neutron capture in (53)Cr produces Doppler broadened line shapes of the secondary transitions. The large (2 sub 3, sup +)(2 sub 1, sup +) M1 strength of B(M1) = 0.39(6)(mu sub n) squared suggests the (2 sub 3, sup +) state to be of mixed symmetry within the Interacting Boson model IBM-2.

Pub. in Atomic Data and Nuclear Data Tables 41, n2 p339-356 1989.

Keywords: *Energy levels, Forbidden transitions, Multicharged ions, Transition probabilities, Ground state, Reprints, *Sulfur-like ions.

Theoretical energy levels have been calculated for the terms of the ground state configuration of all the sulfur-like ions of atomic number Z = 16-92. Transition probabilities have been obtained for the M1 and E2 transitions within the configuration. The calculations were by means of a multiconfiguration-Dirac-Fock technique which included perturbatively the Breit interaction and the Lamb shift for the K-, L-, and M-shell electrons. Results are presented which use experimental and semi-empirical fits to the term energies for ions with atomic numbers up to Z = 42. Above Z = 42, purely theoretical results are given. It is shown that the agreement between the authors' theoretical results and the semi-empirical values of the term energies improves rapidly as Z increases, with all values in excellent agreement by Z = 42.

Experimental Stark Widths and Shifts for Spectral Lines of Neutral and Ionized Atoms: A Critical Review of Selected Data for the Period 1983 through 1988.

Keywords: *Line spectra, *Stark effect, Neutral atoms, Positive ions, Line width, Line broadening, Spectral shift, Reviews, Tables(Data).

A critical review of the available experimental data on Stark widths and shifts for spectral lines of non-hydrogenic neutral atoms and positive ions has been carried out. The review covers the period from 1983 through the end of 1988 and represents a continuation of earlier critical reviews up to 1982. Data tables containing the selected experimental Stark broadening parameters are presented with estimated accuracies. Guidelines for the accuracy estimates have been developed during the previous reviews and are summarized. The data are arranged according to elements and spectra, and these are presented in alphabetical and numerical order, respectively. Comparisons with comprehensive calculations based either on the semiclassical theory, or--for multiply ionized atoms--on the modified semiempirical approximation, are made whenever possible, since the comparison with theory has often been a principal motivation for the experiments.

Stopping Power of Fast Charged Particles in Heavy Elements.
H. Bichsel. Apr 91, 74p NISTIR-4550
Prepared in cooperation with Bichsel (Hans), Seattle, WA.

Keywords: *Stopping power, Proton bombardment, Charged particles, Excitation, Bethe-Bloch theory.

The stopping power formula from Bethe's theory contains terms which are known only approximately and must be estimated with the use of experimental data. These terms include a material constant, the mean excitation energy of the medium, and the shell-, Bloch- and Barkas-corrections. In an analysis of measured proton and alpha-particle stopping powers and ranges, modifying parameters have been introduced into these corrections, and the mean excitation energy was simultaneously adjusted, so as to get the closest possible agreement with experimental results. Such an analysis is reported here for elements with atomic numbers Z = or > 57. The modification parameters introduced for the shell corrections have a simple relation to atomic energy levels. The Bethe theory with the adopted mean excitation energies and proposed adjustments of the shell- and Burkas- corrections predicts stopping powers that are in close agreement with experimental values, within the experimental uncertainties. This agreement was obtained for protons with kinetic energies above about 0.5 MeV, and for heavier ions of charge z at energies above (z - 1.5) MeV/u.

NISTIR-4555
Prepared in cooperation with CEA Centre d'Etudes de Bruyeres-le-Chatel, Montrouge (France).

Keywords: *Quantum chromodynamics, *Vacuum states, Meissner-Ochsenfeld effect, Bose-Einstein condensation, Lagrangian functions, Quarks, Gluons.

By treating the high-momentum gluon and the quark sector as an in principle calculabe effective Lagrangian, the authors obtain a non-perturbative vacuum state for QCD as an infrared quark-gluon condensate. This vacuum is removed from the perturbative vacuum by an energy gap and supports a Meissner-Ochsenfeld effect. It is unstable below a minimum size and it also suggests the existence of a universal hadronization time. This vacuum thus exhibits all the properties required for color confinement.

The storage and handling of atomic antimatter presents special problems because contact with the walls of any material container is prohibited. Laser cooling and trapping and magnetic trapping techniques for neutral atoms are therefore especially appealing. Here the authors review the basic principles of electromagnetic trapping and laser cooling for neutral atoms, and briefly describe a number of already-demonstrated laser and magnetic traps. They discuss limits on the temperatures achievable by laser cooling, as well as some special problems in the laser cooling of hydrogen/antihydrogen. In particular, they present some new results for the case of pulsed cooling.

A general illustration of these types of study will be presented, with emphasis on a few of the more promising new directions in atomic and molecular physics being pursued with synchrotron radiation.

The angular distribution for Ar 2p photoionization has been measured from just above threshold to 400 eV photon energy, and calculated in the same energy range using the relativistic random-phase approximation. The experimental and theoretical results exhibit good agreement, but the present results disagree somewhat with earlier Hartree-Fock (HF) calculations, with the HF values found to be significantly higher in the near-threshold region. Possible reasons for this discrepancy are discussed with relevance to the general understanding of inner-shell photoionization phenomena.

The wave function for a spinless charged particle in an electromagnetic field is decomposed into two probability amplitudes, one for a particle and one for an antiparticle. The particle amplitude is specified at the initial time and the antiparticle amplitude at the final time. Time reflection invariance indicates that the preparation of the antiparticle state at the final time should be carried out by observers composed of antiparticles. A model of elementary particles shows how relativistic quantum mechanics can be used to describe all reactions.

Identifying glueballs is intimately intertwined with the study of meson spectroscopy. In the brief review, recent experimental results are compared with QCD inspired predictions for the masses of the 0(-+), 1(+-), 1(--), 1(++) mesons. They agree remarkably well. For the 0(-+) and 1(++) systems, these agreements lead to the posibility of identifying additional states as candidates for exotica. A major mystery is why the (2(++) sub gT) states are not seen in J/psi -> gamma phi phi, in view of the fact that the OZI-violating mechanism should be a good way to produce glueballs.

Relativistic distorted-wave Born (RDWB) cross sections of Be-like ions for excitations from the ground state, 2s(2) singlet S(0), to the 2s2p triplet P(1) and singlet P(1) state by electron impact are reported for Ne(6+) through U(88+). The spectrum of the copperlike ion Kr VIII was observed with a low-inductance spark and 10.7-m normal- and grazing-incidence spectrographs. A total of 46 new lines with wavelengths ranging from 115 to 696 A were identified: 18 of the type 3d(10)nl-3d(10)nl', 10 of the type 3d(10)4s-3d(9)4s4p, and 18 of the type 3d(10)4p-3d(9)4p(2). From these lines 37 new energy levels were determined: 14 of the type 3d(10)nl, 10 belonging to 3d(9)4s4p, and 13 to 3d(9)4p(2). New values for all known levels were derived by combining the present results with measurements at longer wavelength by Gallardo et al. (Appl. Opt. 28, 5088 (1989)). The authors have observed spatial correlations with up to 15,000 Be(1+) ions in a Penning trap with Gamma > 100. These correlations are strongly affected by the boundary conditions and take the form of concentric shells as predicted by computer simulations. In the paper the authors briefly describe the experimental confinement geometry and the laser cooling of the ions. Experimental techniques for observing the shell structure are described. The relatively large spacings between the ions permit the shells to be directly viewed by imaging the Be(1+) laser-induced fluorescence onto a photon-counting camera. Diagnostic techniques capable of measuring the ion diffusion are then discussed. Qualitative observations of the ion diffusion are compared with theoretical predictions.

New measurements and calculations of near-threshold (0.5-5.0 eV) e-H2 vibrational-excitation cross sections challenge previous determinations based on transport analysis. Elastic and mu(o)=0->mu=1 cross sections measured in a crossed electron-molecular-beam apparatus agree well with values calculated using a vibrational close-coupling theory with a separable representation of exchange, particularly at energies below 2.0 eV, but are incompatible with cross sections derived via analysis of electron-swarm transport data.

Enhanced Flux Creep in Nb-Ti Superconductors After an Increase in Temperature.

The magnetic fields of Superconducting Super Collider (SSC) dipole magnets change with time when the magnets are operated at constant current. The decay of the field is thought to be a consequence of flux creep in the Nb-Ti filaments in the superconducting cables. However, measured magnetic relaxation of small samples of SSC cable as a function of time is unlike the large decays that are observed in the fields of the actual magnets. The authors have made relaxation measurements on sample SSC conductors at 3.5 and 4.0 K after field cycling. The decay at both temperatures was 2.8% in 50 min. However, the relaxation measured after a temperature increase from 3.5 to 4.0 K was 4.8% in 50 min. A likely reason for the greater magnetization decay is that, after an increase in temperature, the Nb-Ti is in a supercritical state, with shielding currents flowing at a density greater than the new critical current density. This causes enhanced flux creep. The authors suggest that a small temperature rise during the operation of SSC magnets may contribute to the unexpectedly large magnetic field decay.

The authors constructed a Hall probe magnetometer to measure the magnetization hysteresis loops of Superconducting Super Collider magnet cables. The instrument uses two Hall-effect field sensors to measure the applied field H and the magnetic induction B. Magnetization M is calculated from the difference of the two quantities. The Hall probes are centered coaxially in the bore of a superconducting solenoid with the B probe against the sample's broad surface. An alternative probe arrangement, in which M is measured directly, aligns the sample probe parallel to the field. The authors measured M as a function of H and field cycle rate both with and without a dc transport current. Flux creep as a function of current was measured from the dependence of ac loss on the cycling rate and from the decay of magnetization with time. Transport currents up to 20% of the critical current have minimal effect on magnetization and flux creep.

The authors have developed a real-time charged particle beam probe which can be used both as a beam diagnostic (beam tuning) and to quantitatively determine the three-dimensional density distribution of a beam. The probe consists of a microchannel plate, an aluminized phosphor screen deposited on a fiber-optic faceplate, a flexible fiber-optic bundle, and a charge injection device (CID) in tandem. Digital or analog video output of the CID is fed into a computer or oscilloscope, respectively, for analysis or observation. The probe can be moved continuously along the beams' paths to obtain 'pictures' of the beam at any desired interval thus giving three-dimensional form factors. Either beam singly or both beams simultaneously may be observed on the monitor facilitating the task of beam adjustment for optimum overlap. The digital output is used for quantitative computation of the beam overlaps. The device is linear with beam intensity, but the performance degrades with time due to beam damage of the microchannel plate.

Measurements of velocity-changing collision (VCC) kernels are obtained using velocity-selective optical pumping. This is the first measurement of the shape of an elastic VCC kernel over the full thermal range of velocity changes. Since ground-state collisions are studied (quintet 5(1/2)) Rb and He, Ne, Ar, Kr, or Xe),very low buffer-gas pressures can be used, and therefore pressure broadening (dephasing collisions) does not obscure the effects of VCC's. The data are deconvolved to eliminate the effects of the natural linewidth and are then extrapolated with respect to buffer-gas pressure to determine the single-collision limit. For small initial velocities, the measured kernels are consistent with a hard-sphere model for large velocity changes, but differ significantly for small velocity changes. The measured VCC kernels for large initial velocities and large velocity changes do not exhibit the agreement with the hard-sphere kernel. This implies that information about the inter-atomic potential can be obtained from a measurement of VCC kernels. The authors also show the inadequacy of the much-used Keilson-Storer kernel (J. Appl. Math. 10, 243 (1952)).

The close relationship between the theory of particle creation in external fields and the theory of quantum-mechanical squeezed states is clarified. It is shown that relic gravitons (and other primordial perturbations), created from zero-point quantum fluctuations in the course of cosmological evolution, should now be in strongly squeezed states. The statistical properties of the stochastic collection of relic gravitational waves are investigated. Some other examples of particle creation, and in particular Hawking's process of black-hole evaporation, are considered in the context of the theory of squeezed states.

There is a need for standardization of high-dose measurements used in the radiation processing industry in order to provide measurement assurance and traceability to national standards. NIST provides dosimetry calibration services to this industry. One of these services involves the administering of known absorbed doses of gamma rays to customer-supplied dosimeters. The dosimeters are packaged to provide appropriate electron equilibrium conditions and are irradiated in a standard (60)Co calibration facility; this provides a calibration of the response of that batch of dosimeters. Another service consists of supplying to a customer calibrated transfer dosimeters for irradiation with the customer's in-house radiation source. The irradiated transfer dosimeters are then returned to NIST for analysis and the results reported to the customer, thereby providing a calibration of the dose rate of the customer's source.

The problem of measuring and characterizing complicated multiple-source, multiple-frequency electromagnetic environments is becoming more important and more difficult as electrical devices proliferate. The paper reviews three general approaches to the problem which have been investigated at the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST). The three approaches are: a statistical treatment of the spatial distribution of electromagnetic field intensities; a numerical computation using a finite-element (or lattice) form of the electromagnetic action functional; and use of a directional probe to scan a volume. All three methods are still in the development stage, but each appears promising.

The median energy is about 0.58 MeV, with 98% of the neutron fluence rate occuring between 1,2 keV and 5.6 MeV. Because of the close correspondence of the (103)Rh(n,n') differential cross section and the kerma muscle response function for neutrons, rhodium is an attractive neutron kerma monitor. In support of its use as a neutron monitor, the spectrum averaged cross section, sigma(bar), has been measured for a (252)Cf fission neutron spectrum. Pairs of rhodium foils were irradiated on opposite sides of a thinly-encapsulated (252)Cf neutron source. The neutron fluence incident on the foils is determined by the source strength, average foil distance, and length of time of the irradiation. Corrections are made for neutron scattering, saturation of activity, and attenuation of the x-rays in the foil during counting. The x-rays were detected with an intrinsic germanium x-ray detector. The results of five separate irradiations yield a value of sigma(bar)(star)P(Kx)=62.3 + or - 19mb. A dscussions of systematic uncertainties is given.

A summary is presented of the procedures used to certify NBS Standard Reference Material 1960, nominal 10 micrometer 'space beads'. Three independent micrometrology techniques were used, with the results agreeing to about 0.1%. Center distance finding, a method based on optical microscopy, gave a value of 9.89 + or - 0.04 micrometers which was chosen as the certified mean diameter. Two supporting measurements, made using metrology electron microscopy and resonance light scattering, yielded mean diameters of 9.886 + or - 0.029 micrometers and 9.898 + or - 0.029 micrometers, respectively. The main peak of the size distribution for this material is nearly Gaussian, with a certified standard deviation of 0.09 micrometrs, excluding outlying particles. The SRM 1960 microspheres were grown in microgravity aboard the NASA space shuttle 'Challenger', making the material the first commercial product to be made in space.

The article summarizes the procedures used at the National Bureau of Standards (NBS) in the certification of a new submicrometer particle-sizing Standard Reference Material (SRM 1691). The mean diameter of the polystyrene microspheres was accurately measured using two independent micrometrology techniques. One technique, transmission electron microscopy, measured the particles dried and in a vacuum, and gave a result of 0.269 + or - 0.007 micrometer for the certified mean diameter. The supporting method, quasi-elastic light scattering, yielded a value of 0.276 + or - 0.007 micrometer for the diameter of the microspheres in liquid suspension. Descriptions of the experimental techniques, data analyses, and sources of error are discussed in the paper. The calibrated microspheres are now available from NBS for use as a primary length standard in the submicrometer size range. Applications include microcontamination measurement in semiconductor processing, atmospheric sampling, and electron-microscope calibration.

Magnetization as a function of transverse magnetic field and time was measured for short strands extracted from the centers and edges of five Nb-Ti Rutherford cables designed for use in Superconducting Super Collider dipole magnets. The multifilamentary strands all had 6-micrometer diameter filaments. Edge samples, which had severe mechanical deformation, showed small magnetic coupling losses at low fields, compared to no coupling losses for undeformed center strands. Sharp strand bends at cable edges decreases the interfilament spacing to the order of the coherence length in the normal matrix material which increases the effective filament diameter and hysteresis loss at low fields. Microscopic studies of the cables' cross sections confirmed smaller interfilament separations in these samples. Flux creep measurements, represented by the time dependence of magnetization, showed little difference between edge and center samples. This indicates that the proximity-coupled matrix in edge samples is not a significant source of flux creep.

Gravity was measured at eight different heights on a 300-m meteorological tower using LaCoste and Romberg gravimeters. The observed values were adjusted for tides, drift, and gravimeter screw errors, and tested for systematic effects due to tower motion. These results are compared with values predicted using Newton's inverse-square law from surface gravity. The differences exhibit no systematic trends and their rms value is well within the estimated errors of the experiment. This result places new constraints on the possible strength and range of any non-Newtonian force.

The following energy-transfer reactions have been observed in a Sr vapor following pulsed excitation of the 5 singlet P(1) state. The r singlet D(2) state was populated by a nonlinear stimulated process. By measuring the rate coefficients for these reactions for over 40 final states n(sup (2s + 1))L, one looks for insight into how these reactions depend on energy defect, spin, and angular momentum. It is found that there is not a very strong dependence on the energy defect, and that singlet and triplet final states are produced in comparable amounts. The final states tend to be populated more effectively as their angular momentum increases. Total rate coefficients are of the order of gas-kinetic rates.

Evidence for Surface alpha Particle Clusters in (nat)AG(197)Au from the (e,alpha) Reaction.
W. R. Dodge. Jun 91, 57p NISTIR-4495

Keywords: *Alpha particles, *Cluster model, *Gold 197 target, *Silver, *Electron reactions, MeV range 100-1000, MeV range 10-100, Electroproduction, Protons, Graphs(Charts).

The (nat) Ag and (197) Au (e,p) and (e, alpha) energy and angular distributions were measured at 6 electron bombarding energies between 50 and 115 MeV at the National Institute of Standards and Technology. The (nat) Ag and (197) Au (e,p) angular distributions exhibit an asymmetric component which increases from 0 to 50% as the proton energy increases from the proton Coulomb barrier to 26 MeV. The (nat) Ag and (197) Au (e, alpha) angular distributions exhibit an asymmetric component which increases from 0 to 30% as the alpha energy increases from the alpha particle Coulomb barrier to 26 MeV. The authors conclude that the asymmetric component of the proton and alpha particle yields are the result of direct or semidirect processes rather than resonance processes and hence, because of the short mean free paths of alpha particles in nuclear matter, give evidence for the existence of alpha particle clusters in the nuclear surface.

Transmission Properties of a Counter-Rotating Pair of Disk Choppers.
Final rept.
J. R. D. Copley. 1991, 10p
Pub. in Nuclear Instruments and Methods in Physics Research A303, p332-341 1991.

Keywords: *Neutron choppers, Time-of-flight spectrometers, High resolution, Crosstalk, Design, Reprints.

Counter-rotating pairs of disk choppers are used to provide pulsed neutron beams for thermal neutron scattering experiments. An important advantage of this type of device, compared with the single disk chopper, is that each disk can be equipped with several slots. A choice of slot widths is then made possible, simply by changing the relative phasing of the two disks. The resolution of an instrument with counter-rotating chopper pairs can therefore be altered without having to modify the incident wavelength or the speed of the choppers. A potential problem, when there are several slots in each disk, is that there will be 'cross talk', i.e. neutrons will be transmitted by a pair of slots other than the intended combination. The author examines the transmission properties of a counter-rotating pair of choppers, and describes methods to determine whether or not cross talk can occur. An important conclusion is that the axial separation between the two choppers must be included in the analysis; this separation, which is generally small (of order several cm), significantly increases the potential for unwanted cross talk. The author briefly discusses the implications of cross talk in the design of a high resolution time-of-flight spectrometer.

The authors describe their recent investigations of associative ionization in laser cooled sodium confined in a new type of laser trap. Their measured cross section at a temperature < 1 mK is three orders of magnitude larger than that measured in previous experiments at higher temperatures. The authors have also seen a dramatic influence of laser intensity on the collision dynamics.

Various interpretations of quantum mechanics are valid insofar as they predict the same experimental results. Some invoke 'wave-function collapse' and some do not. An interpretation based on the collapse postulate provides a simple explanation for a recent experimental demonstration of the quantum Zeno effect (Itano et al., Phys. Rev. A-41, 2295 (1990)), but other interpretations are also valid.

Notched and unnotched sheet specimens of four aluminum alloys were fatigue tested to evaluate potential use in the Superconducting Super Collider. Alloys 7075-T6, 7475-T761, 2219-T87, and 2090-T8E41 were tested in axial fatigue at a stress ratio of 0.1. The unnotched specimens were tested at 295, 76, and 4 K, whereas notched specimens were tested at 76 K only. The fatigue strengths of these alloys were compared with a practical interest in a life of 100,000 cycles. Fatigue strengths with static tensile strengths for notched and unnotched specimens.

New information is presented on the decay of 40-s (132)Sb. A second beta-fed 1+level was identified in Sb; it lies at an energy of 2268 keV and is fed by a relatively strong 0.83% beta-decay branch. Four gamma rays were identified that form a weakly populated cascade from a level at 483 keV. Coincidence data demonstrate that the 254-keV level in this cascade is the 102-ns isomer identified previously by Clark et al. A 96-keV, isomeric gamma ray has also been observed that is placed in the decay of the 4.1-min, 8-isomer in (132)Sb. It may also be the 96-keV transition that is associated with the 1.8 microsec isomer identified in the A=132 chain by Clark et al. The splitting of the levels in the proton-neutron multiplets is discussed and compared with the results of several recent shell model calculations.

Keywords: *Plasma spectra, Isoelectronic sequence, Extreme ultraviolet radiation, Ultraviolet spectra, Palladium, Silver, Cadmium, Reprints, Cadmium-like ions, Chlorine-like ions, Potassium-like ions, Sulfur-like ions.

The elements Pd, Ag, Cd, and Sn were each injected by laser ablation into a tokamak plasma of 1.3-keV electron temperature. Spectra in the range of 50-400 A were observed photographically with a 2.2-m grazing-incidence spectrograph. The authors identified lines in the isoelectronic sequences of S, Cl, Ar and K that were not previously classified. They fall in the range of 51-78 A and were measured with an uncertainty of + or - 0.010 A. Graphs of the differences between the measured and the calculated transition energies vary smoothly and confirm the identifications. Least-squares fits to these differences permit accurate predictions for elements Tc, Ru, Rh, and In that have not been investigated. Similar fits to ground-state doublet splittings in the Cl and K sequences provide accurate values of magnetic dipole transition energies for these ions.

Keywords: *Plasma spectra, Isoelectronic sequence, M1-transitions, Soft x rays, Reprints, *Phosphorus-like ions.

Phosphorus like spectra Cu XV to Mo XXVIII have been identified in tokamak- and laser-produced plasmas in the wavelength range of 83 to 163 A. These were obtained with the TEXT tokamak at the University of Texas and the 1-GW Nd:glass laser at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, using 2.2- and 10.7-m grazing-incidence spectrographs, respectively. Wavelength measurements were made with an uncertainty of + or - 0.005 A. All the classified lines arise from the 3s(2)3p(3)-3s(2)3p(2)3d array. They were identified through detailed comparisons with Hartree-Fock calculations of wavelengths and relative intensities along the isoelectronic sequence. All spectra from Cu to Mo were observed, except for Rb and Sr, whose wavelengths are predicted by interpolation with an uncertainty of + or - 0.02 A. By means of previously observed magnetic-dipole (M1) lines within the 3s(2)3p(3) ground configuration and comparisons with published Dirac-Fock calculations, all the energy levels of the configuration were determined with an uncertainty of + or - 10 to/100 cm for Co to Mo. These levels were used to predict all the M1 wavelengths. A correction to the Co XIV ground configuration is made by means of a previously published list of M1 lines.

While the atomic transition probabilities and radiative lifetimes of neutral argon have been the subject of numerous experiments and calculations, the results exhibit numerous discrepancies and inconsistencies. The authors present for the first time a unified set of atomic transition probabilities, which is consistent with essentially all recent results, sometimes after critical re-analysis. The data consistency and scale confirmation has been achieved in two ways: (1) The authors have carried out some lifetime/branching ratio measurements for a principal 5p level and the associated 4s-5p transitions. These measurements have very closely confirmed the accuracy of the results of recent independent emission experiments. (2) The authors have critically re-analyzed and revised the literature data for the 4s-4p transitions, as well as utilized the results of a similar critical analysis for the 4s-5p transition array, to establish complete sets of absolute data for these arrays. They have found these data to be mutually consistent from cross-correlation checks between the two arrays using recent literature data. Finally, they have proposed renormalization factors for other argon transitions based on the analysis.

The booklet is the United States of America edition of the English-language translation of the sixth edition of Le Systeme International d'Unites (SI), the definitive reference on the SI published in 1991 by the International Bureau of Weights and Measures (BIPM) in the French language. The USA edition conforms in substance with the English-language translation that follows the French-language text in the BIPM publication. That translation was a joint effort of the BIPM, the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) in the United States, and the National Physical Laboratory (NPL) in the United Kingdom. However, to make the booklet helpful to the broadest community of users in the USA, it was necessary to follow current Federal policy, to recognize present USA practices as they are found in the literature of the authors domestic voluntary standards organizations such as ASTM and IEEE, and to use American spelling of certain words. Thus, the USA edition differs from the English-language version in the BIPM publication in the following details: (1) the dot is used instead of the comma as the decimal marker; (2) the American spellings 'meter', 'liter', and 'deka' are used instead of 'metre', 'litre', and 'deca'; (3) a small number of footnotes are added for explanatory purposes and to identify USA practices that differ from those suggested in the BIPM publication; (4) in a few instances, American rather than British spelling or usage is followed for a few common words; and (5) the index has been moderately expanded.

The report is a collection of papers describing magnetic measurements on multifilamentary Nb-Ti superconductor wires and cables as a function of magnetic field and time at liquid-helium temperatures. The papers deal with ac losses and interfilament coupling by proximity effect and eddy currents. Flux creep was investigated under different experimental conditions. A Hall-probe magnetometer, which was used to measure magnetization and flux creep in the presence of a transport current, is described. A method for increasing the critical current of superconducting cable by controlling twist pitch is demonstrated. A critical-state model for the magnetization of superconductors was developed for samples with field-dependent critical current density and rectangular cross section.

Keywords: *Ionizing radiation, *Survey monitors, *Dosimeters, *Calibration, *Laboratories, Performance standards, Gamma rays, X rays, Beta particles, Alpha particles, Neutrons, Criteria, Secondary laboratories, Accreditation.

The document contains standards of performance for laboratories that calibrate instrumentation used to measure ionizing radiation. Such standards are useful for the development of a secondary level of calibration laboratories that can provide a high-quality link between the National Institute of Standards and Technology and those who make routine measurements at the field level. The standards may also be used as criteria on which a decision is based regarding accreditation of a particular laboratory. They were developed by representatives of federally-owned laboratories that perform calibrations of the type addressed by the document. The first major part contains general criteria that must be satisfied by all laboratories seeking accreditation. It includes requirements relating to management and staff, physical aspects of the laboratory, calibrations facilities and equipment, operational procedures, accuracy and quality assurance, and records and reports. Five subsequent major parts establish criteria for calibration of survey instruments, irradiation of personnel dosimeters, calibration of sources, calibration of instruments for diagnostic levels, and calibration of reference-class instruments. The types of radiation covered include gamma rays, x rays, beta particles, neutrons, and alpha particles. An appendix describes the proficiency tests administered by NIST to secondary laboratories as a prerequisite for their accreditation.

Linewidths as narrow as 900 micro Hz were obtained. The frequency stability was measured to be better than 3 x 10 to the -12 power/square root of tau. The inaccuracy in the second-order Doppler shift was reduced to 5 parts in 10 to the 15th power by laser cooling. An apparent pressure shift with an unexpectedly large value was discovered which limits the accuracy of the current experiment to approximately 1 part in 10 to the 13 power.

The dosimetry of a nearly-monoenergetic 6- to 7-MeV photon source developed at the National Bureau of Standards (NBS) for radiation protection instrument calibration has been carried out by NaI(Tl) scintillation spectrometry. The approach uses calculated 3-inch x 3-inch NaI(Tl) detector-response functions that have been shown to be reasonably accurate up to 20 MeV. A least-squares fit of the appropriate response functions to a selected region of the pulse-height distribution determines the primary 6- to 7-MeV photon fluence. The uncertainty in the fluence determination is based on the chi squared of the fit, the statistics of the data, and the uncertainty in the response functions. The air kerma delivery due to the primary photons at a reference point in the photon field is calculated from the primary photon fluence.

Determination of the differences between the Kelvin Thermodynamic Temperature Scale (KTTS) and the International Practical Temperature Scale of 1968 (IPTS-68) in the range from 230 C to 660 C has been accomplished by gas thermometry. The estimated random uncertainty of the results ranges from + or - 0.005 C to + or - 0.008 C; the major uncertainties appear to lie in the determination of the volume of the gas bulb and the determination of its IPTS-68 temperature. The present results differ noticeably from earlier gas-thermometric determinations in the range of temperature overlap. The value found for the thermodynamic temperature of the freezing point of Al is (660.342 + or - 0.015) C.

Three types of transparent radiochromic films, two forming a blue image and one a red image, are now widely used in high dose dosimetry. These are FWT-60-00, a free standing nylon base film (nominal absorbed dose range: 1-50 kGy) which is usually measured at 605 and 510 nm wavelengths, GafChromic dosimetry media, a coated polyester film (nominal dose range: 0.05-30 kGy), which is measured at a variety of visible wavelengths from 675 down to 400 nm, and Riso B3, a free standing polyvinylbutyral base film (nominal absorbed dose range 1-200 kGy) which is measured at a single wavelength, 554 nm. Each of these film types is also supplied in other forms for special applications and different useful dose ranges, so that the systems are now able to measure doses and make radiographic images (without development) over a wide dynamic range, namely 10 to 200,000 Gy, with reasonable precision, nominally + or - 3% at 95% confidence limits, without appreciable dose rate dependence. The high resolution radiographic images can be used for archival dose distribution records.

The National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) Special Publication replaces National Bureau of Standards (NBS) Letter Circular LC1132 published April 19, 1982. It reprints the Department of Commerce, NIST, Federal Register notice of December 20, 1990 titled 'Metric System of Measurement; Interpretation of the International System of Units for the United States' (the International System of Units, abbreviated SI, is the modernized metric system); the Department of Commerce, Office of the Secretary. Federal Register notice of January 2, 1991 titled 'Metric Conversion Policy for Federal Agencies'; and Executive Order 12770 issued by the President of the United States on July 25, 1991 titled 'Metric Usage in Federal Government Programs.' The first Federal Register notice restates the Department of Commerce's interpretation of the International System of Units for the United States that was last published by the Department in 1982; the second revises the Code of Federal Regulations (CFR) to remove the voluntary aspect of the conversion to the metric system of measurement for Federal agencies; and the Executive Order provides Presidential authority and direction for the use of the metric system of measurement by Federal departments and agencies in their programs. Also included is a diagram that shows graphically how the 19 SI derived units with special names are derived in a coherent manner from the SI base and supplementary units.

The report provides an estimate of the total annual dollar costs of establishing and maintaining fire safety in 20th-Century United States. The cost of fire safety estimate is needed to serve as a basis for evaluating the benefits and appropriateness of current and proposed fire research programs of NIST. This was a relatively modest effort to obtain a first-order estimate of these costs and much of what is reported in these two reports is anecdotal. Nonetheless, the central conclusions one comes to in reading them are that the burden of fire on our society is substantially greater than previously realized and that significant reductions in this burden may be readily achievable through the continued development of fire science and the rapid transfer of fire research results. These findings are particularly relevant as the U.S. economy and its manufacturing infrastructure adjust to the competitive challenges of the global marketplace.

The document identifies near term technology developments which would have significant impact on the evolution of the FTS toward autonomous operation. Analysis of anticipated FTS tasks is used to identify operations that might be performed autonomously rather than in a purely teleoperated fashion. Alternative techniques for automating these operations are then described. A discussion of FTS long term evolution is included as an appendix.

The purpose of the report is to propose test procedures for the NASA DTF (Development Test Flight)-1 positioning tests of the FTS (Flight Telerobotic Servicer). The unique problems associated with the DTF-1 mission are discussed, standard robot performance tests and terminology are reviewed and a very detailed description of flight-like testing and analysis is presented. The major technical problem associated with DTF-1 is that only one position sensor can be used, which will be fixed at one location, with a working volume which is probably smaller than some of the robot errors to be measured. Radiation heating of the arm and the sensor could also cause distortions that would interfere with the test. Two robot performance testing committees have established standard testing procedures relevant to the DTF-1. Due to the technical problems associated with DTF-1 these procedures cannot be applied directly. These standard tests call for the use of several test positions at specific locations. Only one position, that of the position sensor, can be used by DTF-1. Off-line programming accuracy might be impossible to measure and in that case it will have to be replaced by forward kinematics accuracy.

In the Mars Sample Return Mission, a rover vehicle may be used to collect and select samples from different locations on the Martian surface to be brought back to earth for laboratory studies. It is anticipated that an in-situ energy-dispersive x-ray fluorescence (XRF) spectrometer will be on-board the rover. In such a mission, sample selection is of higher priority than in-situ quantitative chemical analysis. With this in mind, a simple, direct and speedy pattern-recognition method has been developed as an alternative to detailed chemical analysis of the XRF spectra. The authors present and discuss laboratory demonstrations of the efficacy of this pattern-recognition technique in the analysis of many XRF spectra obtained from a series of geological samples, including a simulated Martian soil.

Development of a National Aerospace Plane (NASP), which will fly at hypersonic speeds, requires novel cooling techniques to manage the anticipated high heat fluxes on various components. The author has constructed a compact heat exchanger consisting of 12 parallel, rectangular channels in a flat piece of commercially pure nickel. The channel specimen was radiatively heated on the top side at heat fluxes of up to 77 W/sq cm insulated on the back side, and cooled with helium gas flowing in the channels at 3.5 to 7.0 MPa and Reynolds numbers of 1400 to 28,000. The measured friction factor was lower than that of the accepted correlation for fully developed turbulent flow, although our uncertainty was high due to uncertainty in the channel height and a high ratio of dynamic pressure to pressure drop. The measured Nusselt number, when modified to account for differences in fluid properties between the wall and the cooling fluid, agreed with past correlations for fully developed turbulent flow in channels. Flow nonuniformity from channel-to-channel was as high as 12% above and 19% below the mean flow.

The NASA Upward Flame Propagation test, which measures response to a well-defined laminar flame at the bottom of a test sample, is currently used to screen for flammability all materials intended for use in the interior of manned spacecraft. The response of a series of materials was compared in the test and in the standard NIST flammability tests (Cone Calorimeter for rate of heat release and LIFT tests for ignitability and lateral flame spread). The goal was to see if these differing flammability assessment approaches provide comparable information on the potential hazards of a material. At the present, a firm relation between the behavior in the NASA test and in the NIST tests has not been established. Recommendations are given for future testing.

Covariance studies were performed to investigate the orbit determination problem for a small transponder satellite in a nearly circular polar orbit with 4-hour period around Mercury. With X band and Ka band Doppler and range measurements, the analysis indicates that the gravitational field through degree and order 10 can be solved for from as few as 40 separate 8-hour arcs of tracking data. In addition, the Earth-Mercury distance can be determined during each ranging period with about 6-cm accuracy. The expected geoid accuracy is 10 cm up through degree 5, and 1 m through degree 8. The main error sources were the geocentric range measurement error, the uncertainties in higher degree gravity field terms, which were not solved for, and the solar radiation pressure uncertainty.

Experimental identification of dynamic behavior in linear structural systems can be achieved by exciting the structure with a specifically synthesized pulse, and reconstructing the relevant dynamic Green's function by deconvolution of the measured response. The reconstruction procedure involves the solution of an ill-posed integral equation in the presence of noise. The paper underlines the rich variety of infinitely divisible pulse shapes that may be used while still retaining a tractable deconvolution problem. Flexibility in pulse shape is necessary to allow for possible perturbations caused by interfacing devices that convert electrical voltages into mechanical forces. A numerical experiment, using synthetic noisy data, shows that the reconstruction procedure remains effective even when the probe waveform deviates strongly from the preferred unimodal shape. A dispersive structural network that may be representative of a large space structure is used as an illustrative example.

To evaluate the thermal performance of these insulating systems, an apparatus capable of measuring thermal conductivity using extreme temperature differences (27 to 1100 K) is being developed. The system is described along with estimates of precision and accuracy in selected operating conditions. Preliminary data are presented.

The report covers a series of static and dynamic tests on electrical conductors specified for use in landing aids on airport runways carried out by NIST for the Federal Aviation Administration. The structures are intended to be frangible so that they will break up readily if impacted, thus minimizing damage to the impacting aircraft. While the structures are frangible, they contain electrical cables which, due to the requirement of electrical conduction, are not frangible. In an actual impact, these cables do not break readily and tend to wrap around the aircraft. The tests authorized by the FAA were carried out to assess the force required to break through various types of FAA specified cables by a simulated aircraft impact. Furthermore, the effectiveness of using break-away connectors was evaluated to determine if they would reduce the total load on an impacting aircraft. In order to correctly design the dynamic test apparatus, it was necessary to know the approximate, expected load levels and cable elongations at fracture. Therefore a series of quasi-static tests were performed on the cables and break-away connectors. The report describes these quasi-static tests as well as the construction and application of the dynamic test apparatus.

The management of geographic information resources (GIRS) continues to be plagued by problems of monitoring, locating and controlling the array of geographic information in complex organizations. Software tools to support these functions are fundamental to any effort to maintain the integrity of geographic information as it changes. In addition, such tools are desirable when formalizing, then managing the integration of geographic information resources within an organization. One of the major approaches to the problem in the area of database systems has been the development of the information resource dictionary (IRD) which contains meta-data. An Information Resource Dictionary System (IRDS) is a database of meta-data along with software and procedures for the creation and maintenance of the IRD. In 1989 the American National Standards Institute (ANSI) X3.138-1988 IRDS (ANSI-IRDS) was adopted as Federal Information Processing Standard 156 by the United States Government. ANSI-IRDS is intended to support the definition, management and control of mete-data. The study presents the first known attempt to actually apply ANSI-IRDS in the geographic information management domain.

The report covers research performed by the National Institute of Standards and Technology for the Federal Railroad Administration. The report covers a project by the Materials Reliability Division (formerly the Fracture and Deformation Division) to develop and build a system to detect and measure residual stress in the rims of railroad wheels. Acoustic birefringence is the underlying principle of operation. This is a measure of the relative difference in the propagation times of two shear waves polarized in radial and circumferential directions. Measurements employ an EMAT (electromagnetic-acoustic transducer) as an ultrasonic probe. This type of transducer requires little or no surface preparation and no acoustic couplant. The system operates in a pulse-echo mode. A short burst of shear horizontal waves travels through the rim thickness. The rotation of the EMAT determines the orientation of the polarization vector, radial or circumferential. Precise timing of echoes in both directions reveals the degree of birefringence. Changes are due to both stress state and metallurgical texture. Initial tests indicate it may be possible to separate these two.

The report covers research performed by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) for the Federal Railroad Administration (FRA). The report covers a project by the Materials Reliability Division (formerly the Fracture and Deformation Division) to develop and build an ultrasonic system to detect crack-type flaws in the tread of railroad wheels. To achieve fully automatic operation, the sensor is built into the rail so testing occurs as the train rolls past. Signal analysis takes place in real time. The ultrasonic probe is an EMAT (electromagnetic-acoustic transducer). As configured here, the EMAT has a small footprint, and, due to its principle of operation, it does not require any acoustic couplant. The system operates in a pitch-catch mode. A short burst of Rayleigh (surface) waves travels around the wheel tread, and an echo indicates a flaw's presence and size. Testing was performed on both a short track in the NIST laboratory and the full-scale facilities of the Transportation Test Center (TTC) in Pueblo, Colorado. The report documents the design, construction, and testing of the system. It is also to serve as an operational guide for the equipment being delivered to the FRA.

New Approach to Vision and Control for Road Following.
D. Raviv, and M. Herman. Jan 91, 46p NISTIR-4476
Prepared in cooperation with Florida Atlantic Univ., Boca Raton.

Keywords: *Robot dynamics, *Control systems, *Computer vision, *Ground vehicles, Robots, Optical processing, Automous navigation, Image processing.

The paper deals with a new quantitative, vision-based approach to road following. It is based on the theoretical framework of the recently developed optical flow-based visual field theory. By building on this theory, the authors suggest that motion commands can be generated directly from a visual feature, or cue, consisting of the projection into the image of the tangent point to the edge of the road, along with the optical flow of this point. Using this cue, they suggest several different vision-based control approaches. There are several advantages to using this visual cue: it is extracted directly from the image, i.e., there is no need to reconstruct the scene; for many road following situations this is the only necessary visual cue; only the horizontal component of the optical flow of the tangent point needs to be extracted; it has a scientific basis, i.e., the described techniques are not ad-hoc; and the related computations are relatively simple and thus suitable for real-time applications. For each control approach, they derive the value of the related steering commands.

SAMPLE ENTRY

Air Pollution & Control
Proposed Standard Practice for Assessing the Performance of Gas-Phase Air Cleaning Equipment
PB91-167353 100,905

Keyword term
Title

NTIS order number Abstract number

2-METHYLPROPANE
Chemical Kinetic Data Base for Combustion Chemistry Part 4. Isobutane.
PB90-244534 100,252

8-HYDROXYGUANINE
8-Hydroxyguanine Content of Isolated Mitochondria Increases with Lipid Peroxidation.
PB91-189472 101,286

Mechanistic Studies of Ionizing Radiation and Oxidative Mutagenesis: Genetic Effects of a Single 8-Hydroxyguanine (7-Hydro-8-oxoguanine) Residue Inserted at a Unique Site in a Viral Genome.
PB91-190108 101,321

AB-INITIO CALCULATIONS
Ab-Initio Calculations and Ideal Gas Thermodynamic Functions of Cyclopentadiene and Cyclopentadiene Derivatives.
PB92-148089 100,468

ABRASIVE BLASTING
Roughness Measures of Blasted Steel Surfaces Remotely Imaged with a Thermographic Camera.
PB91-147686 101,146

ABSORPTION COEFFICIENTS
Scattered Light and Other Corrections in Absorption Coefficient Measurements in the Vacuum Ultraviolet: A Systems Approach.
AD-A227 869/5 100,179

ABSORPTIVITY
Letter to the Editor, Fire Technology, Comments on T.Z. Harmathy Viewpoint, May 1985.
PB91-174797 100,545

ABSTRACTS
Abstract and Index Collection in the Research Information Center of the National Institute of Standards and Technology (Fourth Edition).
PB91-148494 100,959

High-Temperature Superconductivity: Abstracts of NIST Publications, 1987-1991.
PB92-126564 101,105

AC LOSSES
AC Loss Measurements of Two Multifilamentary NbTi Composite Strands.
PB91-133892 100,769

ACCESS
Configuration Management Concepts Document. National PDES Testbed Report Series.
PB91-194480 100,984

ACCESS CONTROL
Thwarting the Hackers.
PB91-159228 100,705

ACCESS METHODS
Issues in Transparent File Access.
PB91-187831 100,569

ACCIDENT INVESTIGATIONS
Investigation of the Collapse of L'Ambiance Plaza.
PB91-204057 100,146

ACCREDITATION
Plumbing Test Lab Accreditation.
PB91-190066 100,089

Laboratory Accreditation in the United States.
PB91-194415 100,172

ACCURACY
Uncertainty and Accuracy in Physical Measurements.
PB91-167205 101,629

Accuracy of Transmission Electron Microscopy Analysis of Asbestos on Filters: Interlabortory Study.
PB91-195727 100,204

ACETIC ACID
Studies on the Degradation Products of Paper with and without Pollutants in a Closed Environment. 1. Preliminary Results.
PB91-143313 101,181

Thermodynamics of the Krebs Cycle and Related Compounds.
PB91-192468 100,357

Mechanisms of the Reduction Reactions of Cr(VI) in the Radiolysis of Acidic Potassium and Silver Dichromate Solutions in the Presence or Absence of Acetic Acid.
PB91-236489 100,241

ACETONITRILE
Mechanism of Cyanide Release in the Radiolysis of Acetonitrile.
PB91-203679 100,240

Rotational Spectrum and Structure of the Complex Ar-Ch3CN.
PB91-236661 100,415

ACETYLENE
Mechanism of Soot Formation in Acetylene-Oxygen Mixtures.
PB91-147280 100,537

Reactions of C5H3(+) and C5H5(+) Ions with Acetylene and Diacetylene.
PB91-195370 100,384

ACID BONDED REACTION CEMENTS
Setting Reactions and Compressive Strengths of Calcium Phosphate Cements.
PB91-148668 100,040

Effect of Catalyst Structure on the Synthesis of a Dental Restorative Monomer.
PB91-158691 100,043

Development of an Adhesive System for Bonding to Hard Tooth Tissues.
PB91-236539 100,052

Dentin-Bonding Molar Efficiency Using N-Phenylglycine, N-Phenyl-beta-Alanine, or N-Methyl-N-Phenylglycine.
PB91-237735 100,053

ACID RAIN
Analysis of Wet Deposition (Acid Rain): Determination of the Major Anionic Constituents by Ion Chromatography.
PB91-236646 100,035

ACID RESISTANCE
Effects of pH and Calcium on Hydrolysis of Na2SiF6 and Na2SnF6: A Quasi-Constant Composition Titration Study.
PB91-194746 101,315

ACOUSTIC DETECTORS
Material Dependency of Chip-Form Detection Using Acoustic Emission.
PB91-149450 101,216

ACOUSTIC EMISSION
Acoustic Emission Monitoring of Laser Drilling.
PB91-158527 101,218

ACOUSTIC EMISSIONS
Deconvolution of Acoustic Emission and Other Causal Time Series.
PB91-216762 101,263

ACOUSTIC FIELDS
Probe-Corrected Spherical Near-Field Scanning Theory in Acoustics.
PB92-117456 101,383

ACOUSTIC VELOCITY
Speed of Sound of Natural Gas Mixtures.

PB91-162214 100,882

Group and Phase Sound Velocities in an Eu1Ba2Cu3O7 Superconductor and Related Perovskite Oxides.
PB91-194860 101,523

ACOUSTICS

Ultrasonic Texture and Stress Measurements in Anisotropic Polycrystalline Aggregates.
PB91-202945 101,237

Accurate Acoustic Measurements in Gases Under Difficult Conditions.
PB92-116847 101,382

ACOUSTICS & SOUND

Device for Audio-Frequency Power Measurement.
PB91-149401 100,733

Extended Abstract: A Finite Element Study of the Stress and Displacement Fields Produced by Point Impact.
PB91-175224 101,584

Acoustic Technique for Evaluation of Thermal Insulation.
PB91-189324 100,123

Microstructure and Elastic Properties of Dental Resin and Resin-Based Glass-Reinforced Composites: XRD, SEM and Ultrasonic Methods.
PB91-204081 100,050

Deconvolution of Acoustic Emission and Other Causal Time Series.
PB91-216762 101,263

Apparatus for Acoustic Measurements of Gases with Applications for High Temperatures.
PB92-116839 100,458

Accurate Acoustic Measurements in Gases Under Difficult Conditions.
PB92-116847 101,382

Performance Evaluation of a New Audio-Frequency Power Bridge.
PB92-117431 100,742

ACRYLATES

Difunctional and Multifunctional Monomers Capable of Cyclopolymerization.
PB91-195685 100,504

ACTINIDES

Interlaboratory Comparison of Actinides in Human Tissue (239)Pu + (240)Pu.
PB91-203265 101,323

ACTIS CODE

ACTIS: Towards a Comprehensive Tribology Data Base.

MOISTURE CONTENT

Prototype Expert System for Diagnosing Moisture Problems in Houses.
PB91-159079 100,062

Analysis of Moisture Accumulation in a Wood Frame Wall Subjected to Winter Climate.
PB92-116334 100,137

MOLAR VOLUME

Unified Description of Infinite-Dilution Thermodynamic Properties for Aqueous Solutes.
PB91-162081 100,319

MOLECULAR BEAM EPITAXY

Magnetic Anisotropies in Ultrathin fcc Fe(001) Films Grown on Cu(001) Substrates.
PB92-116631 101,565

MOLECULAR COLLISIONS

Soluble Models in Surface Collision Dynamics.
PB91-147298 100,276

Problem of Detailed Balance and Model Lineshapes in Collision-Induced Rotovibrational Bands: H2-H2 and H2-He.
PB91-236521 100,412

MOLECULAR DYNAMICS

Molecular Dynamics Study of the Depolymerization Reaction in Simple Polymers.
PB91-187229 100,495

Dynamics of Molecular Hydrogen Adsorbed in CoNa-A Zeolite.
PB91-195255 100,380

Molecular Dynamics of Initial Events in the Thermal Degradation of Polymers.
PB91-195271 100,503

MOLECULAR ELECTRONICS

Permittivity Measurements on Molecular-Sized Samples.
PB91-159244 100,800

MOLECULAR ENERGY LEVELS

Vibrational and Electronic Energy Levels of Polyatomic Transient Molecules. Supplement 1.
PB91-192575 100,367

MOLECULAR GASES

Polarization and Anisotropy of X-ray Emission from Molecules.
PB91-187401 101,651

MOLECULAR IONS

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. III. N4(+).
AD-A228 082/4 100,243

Production and Spectroscopy of Small Polyatomic Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon.
AD-A234 043/8 100,245

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 6. CO4(-).
AD-A238 415/4 100,249

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 7. CO(+), C2O2(+), and C2O2(-).
AD-A239 729/7 100,250

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 5. N2O(1+) and NNO2(1-).
PB91-149906 100,306

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 4. NO(1+), NO(1-), ONNO(1+), and ONNO(1-).
PB91-149914 100,307

Production and Spectroscopy of Small Polyatomic Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon.
PB91-203273 100,395

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 6. CO4(1-).
PB91-236836 100,419

MOLECULAR MEASURING MACHINES

Use of Solid Modeling in the Design of M3 Components.
PB92-123066 101,044

MOLECULAR ORBITALS

Direct Determination of Molecular Orbital Symmetry of H2S Using Polarized X-ray Emission.
PB91-175562 100,335

Theoretical Model of Metal Binding Sites in Proteins.
PB91-194837 100,370

Ab-Initio Calculations and Ideal Gas Thermodynamic Functions of Cyclopentadiene and Cyclopentadiene Derivatives.
PB92-148089 100,468

MOLECULAR RELAXATION

Core Hole Screening for Intermediate Size Metal Particles.
PB91-203539 101,540

MOLECULAR ROTATION

Improved Fits for the Vibrational and Rotational Constants of Many States of Nitrogen and Oxygen.
PB92-148097 100,469

MOLECULAR SIEVES

Structures and Properties of New Zeolite X-Type Zincophosphate and Beryllophosphate Molecular Sieves.
PB91-189449 101,081

MOLECULAR SPECTRA

Heterodyne Frequency Measurements of CO and OCS Beyond 2100 cm(-1).
PB91-236984 100,423

MOLECULAR SPECTROSCOPY

Molecular Spectroscopy Division of the National Bureau of Standards.
PB91-175174 100,332

Fourier Transform Infrared Spectroscopy at the NIST: High Temperature Molecules and Atmospheric Molecules.
PB91-189803 101,424

MOLECULAR STRUCTURE

Structure of Carbon Dioxide Dimer from Near Infrared Spectroscopy.
PB91-147454 100,279

Structures of the NH3-HCCCCH and H2O-HCCCCH Complexes by Fourier-Transform Microwave Spectroscopy.
PB91-148882 100,294

Microwave Spectrum and Molecular Structure of the N2-H20 Complex.
PB91-203448 100,398

Dissociation of Substituted Anisoles: Substituent Effects on Bond Strengths.
PB91-237537 100,431

Spectroscopy and Structure of the Alkali Hydride Diatomic Molecules and Their Ions.
PB92-110147 100,443

MOLECULAR VIBRATION

Vibrational Spectra of Molecular Ions Isolated in Solid Neon. 6. CO4(-).
AD-A238 415/4 100,249

Rovibrational Analysis of the nu7(1) Intermolecular Hydrogen Bond Bending Vibration in HCN-HF Using Far Infrared Fourier Transform Spectroscopy.
PB91-237784 100,437

Improved Fits for the Vibrational and Rotational Constants of Many States of Nitrogen and Oxygen.
PB92-148097 100,469

MOLECULAR WEIGHT

Multiple Variable-Angle Light Scattering Detector for Gel Permeation Chromatography.
PB91-187641 100,195

Study of the Linear Viscoelastic Properties of Cyclic Polystyrenes Using Creep and Recovery Measurements.
PB91-195107 100,502

MOLECULE-MOLECULE COLLISIONS

Cross Sections and Swarm Coefficients for H+ , H2+ , H3+ , H, H2, and H-in H2 for Energies from 0.1 eV to 10 keV.
PB90-244690 101,597

Cross Sections and Swarm Coefficients for Nitrogen Ions and Neutrals in N2 and Argon Ions and Neutrals in N2 and Argon Ions and Neutrals in Ar for Energies from 0.1 eV 10 keV.
PB92-110246 100,452

MOLTEN SALTS

Coupled Phase Diagram-Thermodynamic Analysis of the 24 Binary Systems, A2CO3-AX and A2SO4-AX Where A= Li, Na, K and X= Cl, F, NO3, OH.
PB91-192518 100,362

MOLYBDENUM ALLOYS

Corrosion, Repassivation and Corrosion Fatigue Behavior of the Surgical Implant Alloy, Co-Cr-Mo.
PB91-134700 101,132

Coherency Strain Induced Instability of Solid-Liquid Interfaces in the Mo-Ni System.
PB91-195537 101,235

MOLYBDENUM DISULFIDE

Chemical Effects of Ne+ Bombardment on the MoS2(0001) Surface Studied by High-Resolution Photoelectron Spectroscopy.
PB91-203471 100,399

MOLYBDENUM ISOTOPES

Observation of Anomalous Isotope Ratios in SIRIS Measurements of Molydenum.
PB92-116789 101,361

MOLYBDENUM OXIDES

Refinement of the Structure of Beta'-MoO3.
PB91-203786 101,090

MONITORING

Practical Constraints in Monitoring Micronutrient Intake.
PB91-147421 101,318

MONOCLINIC LATTICES

Physical and Thermo-Mechanical Properties of Monoclinic Single Crystals.
PB91-148767 101,065

MONOMERS

Molecular Dynamics Study of the Depolymerization Reaction in Simple Polymers.
PB91-187229 100,495

Difunctional and Multifunctional Monomers Capable of Cyclopolymerization.
PB91-195685 100,504

MONOMOLECULAR FILMS

Preparation and Properties of Monomolecular Films for Use as Radioactive Source Mounts.
PB91-147249 101,608

Morphology of Polymer Films and Single Molecules.
PB91-203224 100,506

MONOPOLE ANTENNAS

NIST Calibration Procedure for Vertically Polarized Monopole Antennas 30 kHz to 300 MHz.
PB91-185124 100,726

MONTE CARLO METHOD

Simulation Studies of Excluded Volume Effects on Polymer Chain Dynamics in Several Nonlattice Models.
PB91-203364 100,507

MORPHOLOGY

Role of Elastic Energy in the Morphological Development of a Ni-Ti-Al Alloy.
PB91-187161 101,227

MOSFET

Characteristics of the Breakdown Voltage of Power MOSFETs After Total Dose Irradiation.
PB91-149062 100,793

MOSSBAUER EFFECT

Mossbauer Imaging.
PB91-203745 101,294

Mossbauer Study of the Effect of Oxygen Stoichiometry on the High Tc Superconductor Y1Ba2(CuO.97Fe0.03)3O7-x.
PB91-237545 101,558

MOUNTINGS

Preparation and Properties of Monomolecular Films for Use as Radioactive Source Mounts.
PB91-147249 101,608

MULTIMETERS

Investigating the Use of Multimeters to Measure Quantized Hall Resistance Standards.
PB91-236554 100,734

MULTIPHOTON IONIZATION

Signal Detection Efficiency in Multiphoton Ionization Flame Measurements.
PB91-148056 100,540

Resonance Enhanced Multiphoton Ionization Spectra of the GeF and GeCl Radicals from 400-500 nm.
PB91-203281 100,396

MULTIPROCESSORS

Hardware Instrumentation Approach for Performance Measurement of a Shared-Memory Multiprocessor.
PB91-159319 100,601

MUMPS PROGRAMMING LANGUAGE

MUMPS Validation Suite, Version 7.6 (Vax/VMS Backup), 1991.
PB91-507699 100,660

MUMPS Validation Suite, Version 7.6, 1991 (for Microcomputers).
PB91-507707 100,661

MUMPS Validation Suite, Version 7.6 (ANSI), 1991.
PB91-507715 100,662

MUMPS Validation Suite, Version 7.6 (TAR), 1991.
PB91-507723 100,663

MUNICIPAL WASTES

MSW Calorimetry.
PB91-133942 100,878

Monitoring the Fate of Chlorine from MSW Sampling through Combustion.
PB91-174631 100,917

MUNICIPALITIES

Development of a Technique to Assess the Adequacy of the Municipal Water Supply for a Residential Sprinkler System.
PB92-123116 101,358

MUON-CATALYZED FUSION

Muon Sticking in Catalysed d-t Fusion: Nuclear Resonance Effect.
PB91-147959 101,613

MUSEUMS

Linking Information to Objects: A Hypertext Prototype for Numismatists.
PB91-237057 100,657

MUTAGENESIS

Mechanistic Studies of Ionizing Radiation and Oxidative Mutagenesis: Genetic Effects of a Single 8-Hydroxyguanine (7-Hydro-8-oxoguanine) Residue Inserted at a Unique Site in a Viral Genome.
PB91-190108 101,321

NAI DETECTORS

Dosimetry of a Nearly Monoenergetic 6- to 7-MeV Photon Source by NaI(Tl) Scintillation Spectrometry.
PB92-116706 101,723

NANOCOMPOSITES
Spin Glass Magnetic Behavior of Iron/Silica Gel Nanocomposites.
PB91-159178 101,117

Magnetic Properties of Iron/Silica Gel Nanocomposites.
PB91-204073 101,110

NANOSTRUCTURES
Change in Magnetic State of Fe+ Silica Gel Nanocomposites Due to Low Temperature Treatment in Ammonia.
PB91-237321 101,129

NARROW GAP SEMICONDUCTORS
Narrow-Gap Semiconductors and Related Materials.
PB91-162313 101,492

NASREM

PB92-163880 100,941 Not available NTIS

PB92-163898
Metric Measures Up (Ruler).
PB92-163898 100,942 Not available NTIS

PB92-937300
Validated Products List (Cobol, Fortran, ADA, Pascal, MUMPS, SQL).
PB92-937300 100,671 Standing Order

REPT-21
Crack Arrest Fracture Toughness Measurements of Normalized and Inclusion Shape Controlled AAR TC128 Grade B Steel, and Micro-Alloyed, Control-Rolled, and Inclusion Shape Controlled A 8XX Grade B Steel.
PB91-167346 101,150 PC A03/MF A01

REPT-24
Mechanical Properties and Fracture Toughness of AAR TC128 Grade B Steel in the Normalized, and Normalized and Stress Relieved Conditions.
PB92-108901 101,169 PC A03/MF A01

SERI/TP-214-4409
Scanning tunneling microscopy studies of the surfaces of a-Si:H and a-SiGe:H films. Annual report, 1 December 1989-31 January 1991.
DE91002169 100,785 PC A03/MF A01

SR-723-29-89
Summary of Experiments with the Separated Aperture Technique of Dielectric Anomaly Detection.
AD-A230 438/4 100,721 PC A02/MF A01

TR-1
Influence of Filament Geometry on Hot Filament Growth of Diamond Films.
AD-A231 818/6 101,448 PC A02/MF A01

WRDC-TR-90-2081
Detection of Excited States by Laser-Induced Fluorescence and Analysis of Energy Transfer.
AD-A227 296/1 100,242 PC A04/MF A01

NIST Technical Publications

Periodical

Journal of Research of the National Institute of Standards and Technology—Reports NIST research and development in those disciplines of the physical and engineering sciences in which the Institute is active. These include physics, chemistry, engineering, mathematics, and computer sciences. Papers cover a broad range of subjects, with major emphasis on measurement methodology and the basic technology underlying standardization. Also included from time to time are survey articles on topics closely related to the Institute's technical and scientific programs. Issued six times a year.

Nonperiodicals

Monographs—Major contributions to the technical literature on various subjects related to the Institute's scientific and technical activities.

Handbooks—Recommended codes of engineering and industrial practice (including safety codes) developed in cooperation with interested industries, professional organizations, and regulatory bodies.

Special Publications—Include proceedings of conferences sponsored by NIST, NIST annual reports, and other special publications appropriate to this grouping such as wall charts, pocket cards, and bibliographies.

Applied Mathematics Series—Mathematical tables, manuals, and studies of special interest to physicists, engineers, chemists, biologists, mathematicians, computer programmers, and others engaged in scientific and technical work.

National Standard Reference Data Series—Provides quantitative data on the physical and chemical properties of materials, compiled from the world's literature and critically evaluated. Developed under a worldwide program coordinated by NIST under the authority of the National Standard Data Act (Public Law 90-396). NOTE: The Journal of Physical and Chemical Reference Data (JPCRD) is published bi-monthly for NIST by the American Chemical Society (ACS) and the American Institute of Physics (AIP). Subscriptions, reprints, and supplements are available from ACS, 1155 Sixteenth St., NW., Washington, DC 20056.

Building Science Series—Disseminates technical information developed at the Institute on building materials, components, systems, and whole structures. The series presents research results, test methods, and performance criteria related to the structural and environmental functions and the durability and safety characteristics of building elements and systems.

Technical Notes—Studies or reports which are complete in themselves but restrictive in their treatment of a subject. Analogous to monographs but not so comprehensive in scope or definitive in treatment of the subject area. Often serve as a vehicle for final reports of work performed at NIST under the sponsorship of other government agencies.

Voluntary Product Standards—Developed under procedures published by the Department of Commerce in Part 10, Title 15, of the Code of Federal Regulations. The standards establish nationally recognized requirements for products, and provide all concerned interests with a basis for common understanding of the characteristics of the products. NIST administers this program as a supplement to the activities of the private sector standardizing organizations.

Consumer Information Series—Practical information, based on NIST research and experience, covering areas of interest to the consumer. Easily understandable language and illustrations provide useful background knowledge for shopping in today's technological marketplace.

Order the following NIST publications—FIPS and NISTIRs—from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, VA 22161.

Federal Information Processing Standards Publications (FIPS PUB)—Publications in this series collectively constitute the Federal Information Processing Standards Register. The Register serves as the official source of information in the Federal Government regarding standards issued by NIST pursuant to the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 as amended, Public Law 89-306 (79 Stat. 1127), and as implemented by Executive Order 11717 (38 FR 12315, dated May 11, 1973) and Part 6 of Title 15 CFR (Code of Federal Regulations).

NIST Interagency Reports (NISTIR)—A special series of interim or final reports on work performed by NIST for outside sponsors (both government and non-government). In general, initial distribution is handled by the sponsor; public distribution is by the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, VA 22161, in paper copy or microfiche form.
